

John Adams Library,

IN THE CUSTODY OF THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.

SHELF N<sup>o</sup>.

★ ADAMS

224.6

Vol. 1

4/6 2081

MEMOIRS

OF THE

Marchioness of Pompadour.

WRITTEN BY HERSELF.

Wherein are Displayed

The Motives of the Wars, Treaties of Peace, Embassies, and Negotiations, in the several Courts of Europe :

The Cabals and Intrigues of Courtiers; the Characters of Generals, and Ministers of State, with the Causes of their Rise and Fall; and, in general, the most remarkable Occurrences at the Court of France, during the last twenty Years of the Reign of Lewis XV.

---

Translated from the French.

---

IN TWO VOLUMES.

---

VOL. I.

---

---

LONDON:

Printed for P. VAILLANT, in the Strand; and W. JOHNSTON, in Ludgate-Street.

MDCC LXVI.

ADAMS 2246

101

---

---

T H E

EDITOR'S PREFACE.

TH E following work must be acknowledged highly interesting to these times; and to posterity will be still more so. These are not the memoirs of a mere woman of pleasure, who has spent her life in a voluptuous court, but the history of a reign remarkable for revolutions, wars, intrigues,

iv EDITOR'S PREFACE.

alliances, negotiations ; the very blunders of which are not beneath the regard of politicians, as having greatly contributed to give a new turn to the affairs of Europe.

The Lady who drew the picture was known to be an admirable colourist.

They who were personally acquainted with Mademoiselle Poisson, before and since her marriage with M. le Normand, know her to have been possessed of a great deal of that wit, which, with proper culture, improves into genius.

The King called her to court at a tempestuous season of life, when the passions reign uncontrouled,
and

EDITOR'S PREFACE. v

and by corrupting the heart, enlarge the understanding.

They who are near the persons of Kings, for the most part, surpass the common run of mankind, both in natural and acquired talents; for ambition is ever attended with a sort of capacity to compass its ends; and all courtiers are ambitious.

No sooner does the Sovereign take a mistress, than the courtiers flock about her. Their first concern is to give her her cue; for as they intend to avail themselves of her interest with the King, she must be made acquainted with a multitude of things: she may be said to receive her intelligence from the first

A 3 hand,

vi EDITOR'S PREFACE.

hand, and to draw her knowledge at the fountain head.

Lewis XV. intrusted the Marchioness de Pompadour with the greatest concerns of the nation ; so that if she had been without those abilities which distinguished her at Paris, she must still have improved in the school of Versailles.

Her talents did not clear her in the public eye ; never was a favourite more outrageously pelted with pamphlets, or exposed to more clamorous invectives. Of this her Memoirs are a full demonstration ; her enemies charged her with many very odious vices, without so much as allowing her one good quality.

The

EDITOR'S PREFACE. vii

The grand subject of murmur was the bad state of the finances, which they attributed to her amours with the King.

They who brand the Marchioness with having run Lewis XV. into vast expences, seem to have forgot those which his predecessor's mistresses had brought on the state.

Madame de la Valiere, even before she was declared mistress to Lewis XIV. induced him to give entertainments, which cost the nation more than ever Madame de Pompadour's fortune amounted to.

Madame de Montespan put the same Prince to very enormous expences; she appeared always with the pomp and parade of a Queen, even to the having guards to attend her.

Scarron's widow carried her pride and ostentation still further: she drew the King in to marry her, and this mistress came to be queen, an elevation which will be an eternal blot on the Prince's memory.

This clandestine commerce gave rise to an infamous practice at court, with which Madame de Pompadour cannot be charged. All these concubines having children, to gratify their vanity, they must be legitimated; and, afterwards, they found means to marry these sons, or daughters, of prostitution, to the branches

EDITOR'S PREFACE. ix

branches of the royal blood; a flagrant debasement of the house which were in kin to the crown: for though a Sovereign can legitimate a bastard, to efface the stain of bastardy is beyond his power. The consequence was, that the descendants of that clandestine issue aspired to the throne; and, through the King's scandalous amours, that lustre which is due only to virtue, fell to the portion of vice.

It was given out in France, and over all Europe, that Madame de Pompadour was immensely rich: but nothing of this appeared at her death, except her magnificent moveables, and these were rather the con-

x EDITOR'S PREFACE.

consequences of her rank at court, than the effects of her vanity. This splendor his Majesty partook of, as visiting her every day.

The public is generally an unfair judge of those who hold a considerable station at court, deciding from vague reports, which are often the forgeries of ill-grounded prejudice. Madame de Pompadour has been charged with insatiable avarice. Had this been the case, she might have indulged herself at will: she was at the spring-head of opulence; the King never refused her any thing; so that she might have amassed any money; which she did not. There are now existing, in France, fifty wretches.

EDITOR'S PREFACE. xi

wretches of financiers, each of a fortune far exceeding her's.

It was also said, that the best thing which could happen to France, was to be rid of this rapacious favourite. Well; she is no more; and what is France the better for it? Has her death been followed by one of those sudden revolutions in the government, which usher in a better form of administration? Have they who looked on this Lady as an unsurmountable obstacle to France's greatness, proposed any better means for raising it from its present low state? Is there more order in the government? are the finances improved? is there more

xii EDITOR'S PREFACE.

more method and oeconomy? No, affairs are still in the same bad way; the lethargy continues as profound as ever. The ministry, which before Madame de Pompadour's death was fast asleep, is not yet awake. Every thing remains in statu quo. Some European governments have no regular motion; they advance either too fast, or too slow; their steps are either precipitate, or sluggish.

In this favourite's time, there was too much shifting and changing in the ministry; now she is gone, there is none at all, &c. &c.

I am very far from intending a panegyric on Madame de Pompadour.

EDITOR'S PREFACE. xiii

dour. Faults she had, which posterity will never forgive. All the calamities of France were imputed to her, and she should have resigned in compliance to the public: a nation is to be respected even in its prejudices. With any tolerable share of patriotism, Madame de Pompadour would have quitted the court, and thus approved herself deserving of the favour for which she was execrated; but her soul was not capable of such an act of magnanimity: she knew nothing of that philosophy which, inspiring a contempt of external grandeur, endears the subject to the Prince, and exalts him above the throne.

There

xiv EDITOR'S PREFACE.

There is great appearance that this Lady intended to revise both her Memoirs and her will, and that death prevented her: she used to write, by starts, detached essays, without any coherence; and these on separate bits of paper. These were very numerous and diffuse, as generally are the materials intended to form a book, if she really had any such design.

We were obliged to throw by on all sides, and clear our way through an ocean of writings, a long and tiresome business.

It is far from being improbable, that Madame de Pompadour got some

EDITOR'S PREFACE. xv

some statesman, well versed in such matters, to assist her in compiling this book: however that be, we give it as it stands in her original manuscript.

EDITORIAL PREFACE.

The Editor, well versed in such matters, to edit her in compiling this book: however that be, we give it as it stands in her original manuscript.

---

---

M E M O I R S

O F T H E

Marchionefs of Pompadour.

THE following narrative is not confined to the particular history of my life. My design is more extensive: I shall endeavour to give a true representation of the court of France under the reign of Lewis XV. The private memoirs of a King's mistress are in themselves of small import; but to know the character of the Prince who raises her to favour; to be let into the intrigues of his reign, the

VOL. I.

B

genius

genius of the courtiers, the practices of the ministers, the views of the great, the projects of the ambitious; in a word, into the secret springs of politics, is not a matter of indifference.

It is very seldom that the public judges rightly of what passes in the cabinet: they hear that the King orders armies to take the field; that he wins or loses battles; and on these occurrences they argue according to their particular prejudices.

History does not come nearer the mark; the generality of annalists being only the echoes of the public mistakes.

These papers I do not intend to publish in my life-time; but should they appear after my death, posterity will see in them a faithful draught of the several parts of the administration, which were acted, in some measure, under my eye. Had I never lived at Versailles, the events of our times might have been an inexplicable riddle to posterity; so complicated plicated are the incidents, and in many particulars fo contradictory, that, without a key, there is no decyphering them.

Minifters and other place-men are not always acquainted with the means, which they themfelves make ufe of for attaining certain ends. A plenipoten- tiary very well knows that he figns a treaty of peace, but he is ignorant of the King's motives for putting an end to the war.

Every politician ftrikes out a fystem in his own fagacious brain; the fpeculatifts have often fathered on France what ſhe never dreamed of; and many refined ſchemes have been attributed to her mi- niſters, which never made part of their plan.

It is not long ſince a miniſter of a cer- tain court ſaid to me at Verſailles, That the two laſt German wars, which coſt France ſo much blood, and three hundred mil- lions of livres, was the greateſt ſtroke of policy which the age afforded; as this court had thereby insensibly, and unknown to the rest of Europe, reduced the power of the Queen of Hungary: for, added he, if, on the demise of Charles VI. this crown had openly bent all its forces against the house of Austria, a general alliance would have opposed it; whereas it has weakened that house by a series of little battles and repeated losses, &c. &c.

The inserting such an anecdote in the annals of our age would be sufficient to disfigure the whole history. The truth is, that they who were at the head of the French affairs, during these two wars, had no manner of genius.

All details not relative to the state I shall carefully omit, as rather writing the age of Lewis XV. than the history of my private life. The transactions of a King's favourite concern only the reign of that Prince; but truth is of perpetual concern.

I hope

I hope the public does not expect from me a circumstantial journal of Lewis XV's gallantries: the King had many transitory amours during my residence at Versailles; but none of his mistresses were admitted into the public affairs. The reign of the far greater part began and ended in the Prince's bed. These foibles, so closely connected with human nature, belong rather to a King's private life, than to the public history of a Monarch: I may sometimes mention them, but it will only be by the way. I shall likewise be silent in regard to my family. The particular favour with which I have been honoured by Lewis XV. has placed my origin in broad day-light. A Monarch in raising a woman to the summit of grandeur, of course lays open the blemishes of her birth. The annals of the universe have been overlooked, to make a singular case of what has been almost a general practice in the world.

The Roman Emperors often raised to favour and eminence women of more obscure birth than mine: but, without going so far backward, the history of our own Kings abounds with such instances. Though the widow of Scarron the poet rose a step higher than I, she was not born to such exaltation. It is true her father was a gentleman; but all women, not born Princesses, are at a like distance from the throne.

A multitude of injurious reports have been propagated concerning my parents. A wretched anonymous writer has gone even farther, by publishing a scandalous book with the title of the history of my life. The Count D'Affry wrote to me from Holland, that this production was of the growth of Great-Britain. The English seem to make it their particular business to throw dirt at persons of distinguished rank at the court of France: that government is said to claim such a pri-

a privilege, in order to keep up the hatred between the two nations.

Though my birth had nothing great in it, my education was not neglected. I was taught dancing, music, and the rules of elocution, by excellent masters; and those little talents have proved of the highest use to me. I also read a great deal, and a favourite writer of mine was one Madame de Villedieu. Her picture of the Roman empire entertained me exceedingly. I even felt a very lively joy in observing that the greatest revolutions in the world have been owing to love.

After bestowing on me all the accomplishments which advantageously distinguish a young person of my sex, I was married to one whom I did not love; and a misfortune still greater was, that he loved me. This I call a misfortune, and indeed I know not a greater on earth; for a woman not beloved by a man, whom she likewise has married without any af-

8            M E M O I R S of the fection, at least comforts herself in his indifference.

During the first years of my marriage, the King's gallantries were much talked of at Paris: his fleeting amours opened a field for all women, who had beauty enough to put in for his heart.

The post of mistress to Lewis XV. was often vacant. At Versailles all the passions had an appearance of debauchery. In that airy region love was soon exhausted, as consisting wholly in fruition. Nothing of delicacy was to be seen at court; the whole scene of sensibility was in the Prince's bed. This Monarch often laid down with a heart full of love, and the next morning rose with as much indifference.

This account made me shudder; for I own I had then formed a design of winning the heart of that Prince. I was afraid that he was so used to change, as to be past all constancy.

I even

I even, then, blushed at the thought of giving myself up to an inclination of no farther consequence than a momentary gratification of the senses ; but was fixed on my design.

I had often seen the King at Versailles, without being perceived by him ; our looks had never met ; my eyes had a great deal to say, but had no opportunity of explaining my desires. At length I had an interview with the Monarch, and, for the first time, talked with him in private. There is no expressing what passed in me at this first conversation ; fear, hope, and admiration, successively agitated my soul. The King soon dispelled my confusion ; for Lewis XV. is certainly the most affable Prince in his court, if not in the whole world. In private discourse his rank lays no restraint, and all ideas of the throne are suspended ; an air of candour and goodness diffuses itself through every part of his behaviour ; in short, he can forget that he is a King, to be the more a gentleman.

Our conversation was to me all charming: I pleased and was pleased. The King has since owned to me, that he loved me from that first interview. It was there agreed that we should see one another privately at Versailles: he was very much for my immediately coming to an apartment in the palace: he even insisted on it; but I begged he would give me leave to remain still incognito for some time; and the King, being the most polite man in France, yielded to my request. On my return to Paris, a thousand fresh emotions rose in my breast. A strange thing is the human heart! we feel the effects of those passions of which we know not the cause. I am still at a loss whether I loved the King from this first meeting: that it gave me infinite pleasure, I know; but pleasure is not always a consequence of love. We are susceptible of a multitude of other passions, which may produce the like effect.
of

I experienced a thousand delights in our secret intercourse: little do I wonder that Madame de la Valiere, in the infancy of her amours with Lewis XIV. was so transported with the sole enjoyment of that Monarch's affection: but at length, the King requiring that I should live at Versailles, I complied with his desire.

Now was my first appearance at court. Very faint and imperfect are the descriptions which books give of this grand theatre. I thought myself amidst another species of mortals: I observed that their manners and usages are not the same; and that in regard to dress, deportment, and language, the inhabitants of Versailles are entirely different from those of Paris. Every courtier, besides his personal character, frames to himself another, under which he acts his several parts. In town, virtue and vice are streightened; here both range at large. The passions are the stronger, as they happen to be at the source of the means of gratifying them. Private interest, from whence they derive all their activity, is there in its centre. The Prince's favour gives life and motion to the courtier's soul: without a beam from the throne, it is all a horrid gloom.

To appear with dignity on this theatre, where I was an utter stranger, I saw that it behoved me to make it my first care to examine into the temper of those actors who played the capital parts.

Of his Majesty I knew nothing, but by common report; and that, when it relates to a reigning Prince, is generally wrong; either flattery attributing too many virtues to him, or malevolence charging him with too many vices.

Lewis XV. is endowed with great natural parts, a surprizing quickness of apprehension, and solidity of judgment.

He

He, at once, discerns the springs which give motion to the most complicated affairs of politics: he knows all the weaknesses of the general system, and the faults of each particular administration. This Prince has a noble and exalted soul: the blood of the legislator, the hero, and the warrior, runs in his veins; but a narrow education has stifled the effect of these advantages. Cardinal Fleury, having not one great principle in himself, trained this Prince to nothing but trifles: yet this unequal education did not extinguish in him the most amiable qualities which can adorn a Sovereign. It is impossible to exceed the goodness of Lewis XV's heart: he is humane, mild, affable, compassionate, just, delighting in good, a declared enemy to every thing which does not bear the stamp of honour and probity, &c. &c.

Singular likewise are the virtues of the Queen: she has laid all domestic hardships ships at the foot of the cross; so far from lamenting a fate, which would have embittered the whole life of another Princess, she considers it as a particular favour of Heaven, from a persuasion that Providence is pleased to try her firmness in this life, in order to confer the greater reward on her in the next. None of those fretful words which speak a rankled heart ever came from her: she dwells with pleasure on the King's eminent qualities, and draws a veil over his weaknesses: she never speaks of him but with a sensible respect and veneration: it is impossible for any lady to carry Christian perfection to a higher degree, and to center so many qualities in a rank, where the least defects efface the greatest virtues.

The Dauphin, being at that time very young, did not in the least concern himself in public affairs. The King had ordered him not to interfere in politics, and he seemed sufficiently inclined to conform to such injunctions.

The

The young Princeffes kept pretty much in their apartments, and read a great deal. Sometimes, indeed, they went a-hunting, dined with the King in public, fhewed themfelves at the balls; then withdrew, without much minding the intrigues of the court.

The Duke of Orleans, though firft Prince of the blood, feldom came to Verfailles: he had given into devotion, and fpent his life in deeds of charity.

The Prince of Conti was at that time in the field, and wholly taken up with military glory.

Condé was very young, and his uncle Charolois funk in the moft debauched intemperance.

The other Princes of the royal blood had little or no fhare in public affairs; accordingly they never came to Verfailles, but to be prefent at a great council, or at the King's levée.

Cardinal

Cardinal Tencin bore a great sway at court ; the King confided in him very much ; so that they often used to be busy together. The most weighty concerns of the crown were put into this ecclesiastic's hands. Many extolled him as a great minister ; but as I scarce knew the man, I shall say nothing of him : yet, when I think how much France has suffered by Richelieu, Mazarin, and Fleury, I own I do not like to see people of that class at the head of affairs.

The Count de Maurpas excelled all the ministers of that time in genius, activity, and penetration : he was of as long a standing in the ministry as Lewis XV. in the sovereignty. To him the kingdom is indebted for several noble institutions. It was he who re-established the navy, which, after the death of Lewis XIV. had been most shamefully neglected. I have been told that the Levant trade was entirely his work. He was indefatigable in

in his department; and his difpatches were furprifingly accurate. I have feen many of his letters; and think it is fcarce poffible to comprize fo many things in fo few words.

The d'Argenfons, who had been introduced lately into the miniftry, had as yet no fettled character: they were faid not to want either genius or probity; but that is not always fufficient for a proper difcharge of fuch a poft. I have heard that many qualifications are requifite; and that, if the the leaft of them be wanting, there is no making any figure in the miniftry.

The Count de St. Florentin, who managed ecclefiastical matters, was little confidered either at court or in town. He kept himfelf neuter amidft the intrigues of Verfailles, minding only the bufinefs of his own department. As no great genius is required to iffue letters de cachet, and banifh priests, he filled his post with all the dignity of a minister whose only business is to sign.
poft

Orry, the Comptroller-general, was looked upon as a man of abilities, from his talent at scheming pecuniary edicts. Within some months after I had been settled at Versailles, he laid before the King no less than twenty-five, and these were to bring in two hundred millions. He was called the Grand Financier, from his finding resources for the King, by impairing those of the state.

The Prince de Soubise was a man of parts and discernment. He knew a great deal; but his friends could have wished that he had not embarked in war. The soldiery had no opinion of him: perhaps in this they were wrong; yet a great man, who would be useful to his country, must give way to public prejudice.

Marshal Noailles had still greater abilities; so that it may be questioned whether ther

ther ever any one statesman or general possessed fo extensive a knowlege. The forming of him was an effort of nature. There is not a science relating to political, civil, and military government, with which he was not intimately acquainted; but the exertion of these qualities was limited to the cabinet. His timidity and irresolution, in a day of action, benumbed his faculties, otherwise fo excellent: his genius was certainly vast and extensive; and I question whether Europe had his equal in council.

Marshal Belleisle was then in high reputation: the court and town were full of his praise. There was not in all France a man who had been at more pains to acquire a superficial knowlege of uselefs things: he pretended to be acquainted with every subject, and he had the art of making others believe fo; hence it was not in the least suspected that he understood the art of war as little as that of negotiation:

his

his manners were mild and engaging, and he had an agreeable fluency of speech; but he was so conceited of his knowlege, that although he affected a certain degree of modesty, still his deportment was sure to betray his pride: in short, I never knew a vainer creature.

The Chevalier Belleisle did not affect to have so much understanding as his brother, which shewed him to have the more; but he had all the excessive ambition of the Marshal, and lost his life in attempting to force an intrenchment, the success of which would have raised him to the same rank.

The Duke de Richelieu was still more idolized than Marshal Belleisle. The King could not be without him. He was sure to be one at the private suppers, and he superintended all the diversions of Versailles. Never was any man like him for striking out a party of pleasure, and enlivening it by little incidents. He made it his business to divert the King, and was very alert in seizing every opportunity conducive to that end : but it was not for the King's sake that he gave himself all that trouble : his motive of acting was his own aggrandizement ; for he is insatiably greedy of rank and distinctions. Though of no genius for war, he had the ambition of being created a Marshal of France ; and without any political talents, he was for thrusting himself into the ministry.
and

Maurice of Saxony was the hero of France : he was esteemed the kingdom's guardian angel. I shall speak of him when I come to treat of the battle of Fontenoy.

Monsieur d'Etrées had the reputation of an able general : I shall make farther mention of him in the sequel.

The greater part of the other courtiers were subordinate officers : they used to come come from the army to Versailles, and then go back from Versailles to the army; all their business at court being about preferments. These were the Dukes of Grammont, Piquigny, Biron, la Valiere, Boufflers, Luxembourg; the Marquisses of Putange, Maubourg, Bregè, Langeron, Armentieres, Creil, Renepont; the Counts Coigny, la Mothe-Houdancourt, Clermont, Estrées, Berenger; Messieurs d'Aumont, Meuse, Ayou, Cibert, Chersey, Buckley, Segur, Fenelon, St. André, Varennes, Montal, Balincourt, la Fare, Clermont-Tonnerre, with many more who were for raising themselves by the sword.

There was, at that time, scarce a woman at court who aspired at the King's affections. Those of a distinguished rank disdained to be the objects of a transient love; and others, who courted that situation, had neither beauty nor graces sufficient to obtain it; so that it was only

Parifian Ladies who entered into any of thefe intrigues : feveral were fure to place themfelves in fight whenever the King dined in public ; and always attended him to the chace : in fhort, they were ever dangling after his Majefty, which was juft the very way to come fhort of their aim.

My thoughts were employed to fecure myfelf in the ftation to which fortune had raifed me. The King was with me as often as the affairs of the crown would allow ; leaving all grandeur behind him, and coming into my apartment without any thing of that ftate which attends on him at other places : for my part, I clofely ftudied his temper.

Lewis XV. is naturally of a faturnine turn : his foul is fhrouded in a thick gloom ; fo that, with every pleasure at command, he may be faid to be unhappy. Sometimes his melancholy throws him into fuch a languor that nothing affects

fects him, and then he is quite insensible to all entertainment and pleasure. In these intervals, life becomes an insupportable burden to him. The enjoyment of a beautiful woman for a while diverts his uneasiness; but so far is it from being a lasting relief, that his melancholy afterwards returns upon him with redoubled weight.

Another misfortune in this Prince's life is, the continual conflict between his devotion and his passions; pleasure drawing him on, and remorse withholding him: under this incessant struggle, he is one of the most unhappy men in his kingdom.

I perceived that the King's disposition was not to be changed by love only: this put me on engaging him by the charms of conversation; which has a stronger influence with men than the passions themselves. Of this, history furnished me with an instance in the person son of his great grandfather. Lewis XIV. had so habituated himself to Madame de Maintenon, that no other woman could make any impression on him; and, tho' the court at that time was full of celebrated beauties, Scarron's widow, at an age when female influence over man is generally on the decline, found means so strongly to fix his affection, that her death only put an end to the charm.

I planned a series of diversions, which, following close on one another, got the better of the King's constitution, and diverted him from himself. I brought him to like music, dancing, plays, and little operas, in which I myself used to perform; and private suppers terminated the festivity. Thus the King lay down and rose in perfect satisfaction and good humour. The next day, unless detained on some great council, or other extraordinary ceremony, he would hasten to my apartment, to take, if I may presume to use the expression, his dose of good humour for the whole day. He grew fond of me from that instinct which makes us love what contributes to our happiness. All the favourites before me had thought only of making themselves loved by the King: it had not come into their heads to divert him.

Thus I became necessary to his Majesty; his attachment grew stronger every day. I could have wished that our union had rested on love only; but with a Prince accustomed to change, we must do as well as we can.

After the first moments of surprize, which naturally arises in our minds upon any great change, I, in my turn, gave myself up to uneasy reflections. Amidst all the King's affection, I feared the return of his inconstancy. I could lay but little stress on my elevation; all bow the knee to the idol whilst the Prince worships ships it ; but on his over-throwing the altar, it is trampled under foot. Some days after I thought I had more reason than ever to fear ; for the King, coming to sup with me, seemed more thoughtful than usual. Instead of that gaiety which began to be natural to him, his countenance was quite clouded : all his talk was about politics, the affairs of Europe, and dispatching a courier to the army ; thus, after a short conversation, he withdrew. This abruptness filled me with alarms : I had not a wink of sleep ; and next morning I sent him an account of my condition in the following note :

“ S I R E,

“ Your politics have quite broke my “ heart. I was going to say a thousand “ pleasant things to you, had not your “ dispatches interrupted me. I have not “ closed my eyes during the whole
 C 2 night ;

“ night ; for God’s sake, Sire, leave “ Europe to itself, and allow me to lay “ open to you the state of my heart, “ which is on the rack when you deprive “ me of any opportunity of telling you “ that I love you with an affection, the “ end of which will be that of my life.”

The King having read my letter, came in person to my apartment to make me easy ; and he was now more gay than usual. I think I never saw him in a better temper. He had already given me some insight into the great events at that time on the carpet, and I was for diving into the truth of these abstruse mysteries ; but not a word did I then understand in politics. I have heard that the English ladies have every morning ready laid on their toilet a paper giving them an account of the affairs of Europe, whereas all that we French women find there is our paint-boxes.

I ap-

I applied to Marshal Belleisle. “My Lord, be so kind as to instruct me in what you call politics, which every body here is continually talking of.” He answered me smiling, “I cannot bring myself, Madam, to instruct you in a science which will prove destructive to many.” Yet the veteran courtier talked to me of systems, and enlarged upon the methods to be used by a state for its aggrandisement.

After listening to him for some time, I concluded, though a novice at court, that this science is not reducible to principles nor general rules, as totally depending on time, place, and circumstances, and these almost ever arising from chance.

In order to get a knowledge of the preceding administrations, I set myself to read the history of our government; but it was not in books that I sought for this knowledge, having always looked on them as the source of public errors. I consulted original manuscripts, which were put into my hands by the King himself. Here I saw all the former mistakes, and the original causes of them.

As it was known both at Paris and Versailles that Lewis XV. was unsettled in his amours, his favourites had no very regular court. It often fell out that a lady whom the King had distinguished, lay down in high favour, and rose in disgrace: for vacant employments and temporary grants the favourites were practised on; but for the great purposes of ambition other springs than mistresses were set to work.

In the first months of my favour scarce any body came near me. The Duke de Richelieu was the only nobleman who visited me in the King's absence; but when, by the Monarch's order, I made my appearance as Marchioness de Pompadour, and his Majesty was continually giving me marks of his esteem, the face of things changed. Envy and ambition formed two numerous parties. The former blackened me with the most virulent malice; and the latter as much exceeded in the most fulsome adulation. The motive in one was hope of preferment, the other acted from a despair of ever being preferred: both, however, joined in asking favours of me.
of

I used my interest with the King in behalf of both. If I raised a person to a considerable post, or procured him a large pension, I surely drew on myself a hundred enemies, besides his ingratitude. At length all the kingdom came to pay their court to me; for the royal favour continued to shine on me as bright as ever. They who had been the most forward in reviling my birth, now claimed kindred with me. I shall never forget a letter I received at Versailles from a gentleman of one of the most antient

32      M E M O I R S of the families in Provence, in the following terms :

“ Dear Cousin,

“ I did not know that I was related “ to you till now that the King has cre“ ated you Marchioness de Pompadour :
“ a learned genealogist has demonstrated “ to me, that your great-grandfather was “ fourth cousin to my grandfather ; so “ you see, dear cousin, our alliance “ is indisputable. If you desire it, I’ll “ send you our pedigree, that you may “ shew it to the King.

“ In the mean time, my son, your cou“ sin, who has served with distinction “ several years, wants a regiment ; and “ as he cannot hope to obtain it by his “ rank, be so good as to ask the favour “ from the King.”

I sent

I sent him the following answer:

SIR,

“ I shall lay hold of the very first opportunity to desire his Majesty to give your son a regiment. But I likewise have a favour to ask of you, which is to dispense me from the honour of being related to you. I have some family reasons which forbid me to think, that my forefathers have ever been allied to any of the antient houses of this kingdom.”

Half France would hide themselves for shame, were I to give a detail of all the mean, fawning letters sent to me by persons of the first families in the kingdom. A Princess could write to me in this manner ::

“ My dear Friend;

“ I beg you would ask the King for a grant of farmer-general for Mr. Ar-

C 5

“ mand

“mand M——, a superannuated clerk, “whose fortune I would gladly make.
 “For this favour I shall hold myself “obliged to you as long as I live.

“I am, my dear,

“With all possible regard,

“Your most humble servant.”

The public envy, however, increasing with the marks of royal favour, the world, at any rate, would make me answerable for the events of the times. It has been in every body's mouth, that all the misfortunes of France were owing to me. If there were any grounds for such a charge, the kingdom must have been in a prosperous and flourishing state when his Majesty called me to Versailles; whereas it was very far from being so. The cause of the evil lay deep; so that France, under all its pressures, was only fulfilling its destiny. The misfortunes of the administration stration in this reign are to be considered as flowing from the former administration.

At the time of the demise of Lewis XIV. the kingdom was in a dreadful disorder; the debts of the nation were immense, and the public credit totally ruined; so that the state then laboured under an evil, which was not to be cured by temporary remedies. Lewis the Great, by his excessive fondness for splendor, had impoverished the people. The preceding Kings were contented with being the stewards or managers of the general wealth, but he made himself the proprietor of it: he became master of the nation's treasure; all the finances were in his hands: he had augmented the crown revenues beyond all relative proportion: in the course of three years the whole species of France came into his coffers: besides, his magnificence had set his subjects the pernicious

36      M E M O I R S of the
cious example of impoverishing themselves by profuse expences.

The duke of Orleans, who was at the head of the state after Lewis XIV. so far from restoring order, increased the confusion. He promoted a system of finances, which proved their utter ruin. All the riches of the monarchy changed hands. No such thing as money was to be seen; foreigners ran away with one part, and domestic stock-jobbers secreted the other; no plan of administration could be contrived, capable of putting a stop to evils, unprecedented from the very foundation of the monarchy. This revolution greatly affected the several branches of the national strength. Agriculture, trade, arts, and ingenuity, were sufferers by it, and still suffer: for I have heard very knowing persons say, that the grand system had given birth to many detrimental systems in the state.

Cardinal

Cardinal Fleury succeeded him; and things went still worse: he alone did more harm to France than all those before him, who had like to have ruined this realm. His particular qualities were order, oeconomy, and moderation; virtues excellent in a private person, but in a statesman often very great vices. All his view was, to fill the treasury, fancying that if the King were but rich, the state would no longer be poor. Thus he went on increasing the opulence of the crown, from the people's subsistence. Intent upon saving, he let the navy run to ruin, that is, he deprived France of the only way left for retrieving itself.

Fleury died; but this produced no amendment in the administration. France had not a minister capable of setting things to rights. They who were put at the head of affairs, were very busy, but without any knowledge. I have been told by a very experienced person, who used to come and see see me at Versailles, that if at the Cardinal's death the ministry had been put into the hands of an angel, he could not have done the crown much good. He added, that all the most able minister could do, was to prepare materials for a better administration. The government, said he, has six capital imperfections, and these are not to be amended, but by casting the constitution in a new mould.

Another outcry was my being the source of favours, and that I disposed of every thing in the kingdom; with this addition, that I had brought the King to such a custom of visiting me, as had made it a kind of law to him, never to refuse me any thing. To this I answer, that it is an evil both necessary and natural to absolute government. Sovereigns must either have a confidant or a mistress; and of the two the state generally suffers most by the former. Men in general have ambitious views, which a woman does not trouble herself about. The confident studies to avail himself of the prince's favour in all the means of raising himself to the highest fortune; he gets the sole management of the public finances; he engrosses the most lucrative posts, and distributes among his relations and creatures, those which he does not take for himself: the consequence of this is a general revolution in the government. In short, he has schemes of grandeur and elevation quite foreign to our sex.
have

I have read in the annals of our monarchy that Richelieu's ambition brought a thousand mischiefs on France: that favourite of Lewis XIII. sacrificed every thing to a giddy desire of appearing to be the only person of consequence in the kingdom. He cut the very sinews of the political power of all other bodies. He annulled the privileges of the nobility, which alone could make any stand against the despotism despotism of our Kings; and therein he did more harm to France, than ever it has to fear from any mistresses.

Mazarine, the second favourite, had an army in pay, and personally made war on the state. He imprisoned the princes of the blood, and raised such animosities and disturbances as in a manner subverted all government. He got the public treasure into his possession; almost all the money of the kingdom was in his coffers. He used to sell the principal state employments: when the King wanted money he was obliged to apply to him. And our times have seen Count Bruhl, the King of Poland's favourite exceed his master, in extravagance.

There are, at this time, several Dukes in the kingdom* who give France cause to remember that its Kings have had favourites; whereas what great fortune, what titles or distinctions has my brother Marigni? Die when he will, he will leave no monuments of the particular favour with which Lewis the XVth honoured me.

* The dukes of Richelieu, Mazarin, and Fleury.

I have been likewise accused of introducing into the ministry persons of no turn for business, ignorant, shallow, and superficial fellows: but where shall I find any other in France? The human mind seems to have been degenerated among us.

The French nobility, though most concerned in the public administration, give no attention to business; their life is a round of indolence, luxury, and dissipation. They know as little of politics as of finances and œconomy. A gentleman either spends his life at his seat in rural sports, or comes to Paris to ruin himself with an opera girl. They who have an ambition to figure in the ministry, have no other merit than intrigue and cabal.

If they are traversed in their views, or afterwards superseded, such measure is with them an effect of the prince's prejudice.

The age of able ministers in France seems past. After all my inquiries for Colbert and Louvois, I could only meet with Chamillards and Dubois's; so that I was forced to commit all the branches of government to financiers by profession; a set of people void of capacity, and only skilful in one thing, which is pilaging the state.

My enemies have farther affirmed, that I put the King on too frequent a change of his ministers; but that is an invention, which, in no wise, belongs to me. Before ever I knew the court, placemen were not more settled in their posts than since. Every day saw such creations and institutions; and this, perhaps, may still be a necessary evil in France. Before those gentlemen are in place, nothing can come up to their plan of government; they they have effectual ways and means for reforming every thing that is amifs; they know the feat of the difeafe, and what will remove it: but no fooner have they got the reins of government in their hands, than their incapacity throws every thing into confufion. On the public misfortunes they fcarce beftow a thought; all they mind is their own personal intereft. The ambition of being prime minifter foon gets footing in them; and its continual agitation leaves no room in their mind for any attention to the kingdom. Ten years of adminiftration in France make a minifter fo abfolute, that he grows a mere Pacha; any intimation of his is a peremp- tory order: the Grand Signior is not more defpotic at Conftantinople than a French Secretary of State, after fpending ten years at Verfailles.

It is the fame with military affairs: however brave and courageous the French nobility may be, they have little or

or no genius for war: the hardship of a campaign immediately puts them out of conceit. France has no military school*. A young nobleman is made a Colonel before he is an officer, and then steps into the general command, without any experience. If two Frenchmen are appointed to command the armies in Flanders or Germany, immediately the spirit of envy kindles among them, and they will gratify their private piques and quarrels, whatever becomes of the state. In the mean time, the enemies profit by these divisions, and forward their schemes. In the late war, the King was obliged to commit the safety of his crown to two foreigners: had it not been for the Counts Saxe and Lowendahl, the enemies of France might have been at the gates of Paris.

* The military school was but just instituted.

It is a mistake to think that a woman, who is in diftinguifhed favour with a Prince, ftands in need of weak minifters and bad generals to fupport her: incapacity fpoils all and answers no purpofe. Political mistakes, at the fame time that they throw a fhade on the Prince's glory, utterly efface the luftre of his favourite. I can truly fay, that moft of the vexations I have gone through, fince my refidence at court, proceeded from hence. On every advantage gained by our enemies the king ufed to be melancholy and full of thought; and though this Prince be extremely polite, and not one difobliging word came from his mouth, yet his difcomposure, at that time, embittered every other enjoyment of my life.

I never made a minifter, I never advifed the King to confer the command of an army on any perfon, of whose abilities I was not certainly convinced, and whose merit was not univerfally confefled. The great great used to compliment me on it, and the King himself congratulated me on my good judgment of men; their fitness was proclaimed by the universal voice.

I must here mention the troubles the court laboured under, when the King gave me an apartment at Versailles; the occurrences of those times belonging to the plan of these Memoirs. Without that crowd of incidents which then fell out, and which the King used to communicate to me, my favour perhaps had never risen to such a height; for the events of this world are always directed by second causes.

Ever since the year 1741, France had continued to wage war in Italy, in Flanders, and in Germany. Charles the VIth. the last male descendant of the house of Austria by the male side, had an ambition, which was not to be limited even by death; he was for surviving himself, and transmitting his power beyond the grave.
and

This Prince, after acquiring a very large extent of dominions, had procured them to be guarantied by the chief powers of Christendom. The small military force at that time on foot in Europe, had induced the Christian Princes, to such a weak compliance. Italy was quite spent; all the petty governments of the empire were under a political slavery; and the great houses of the North were little better. On the decease of that Prince all began to breathe, and every one claimed their respective right.

The Elector of Bavaria demanded a part of the succession; Augustus King of Poland set forth his pretensions; the King of Spain likewise put in for a share: and, what is more, there appeared two pragmatic sanctions; one giving the Austrian dominions to the Archduchess, spouse to the
the

the Polish Prince; and the other securing them to Maria Theresa, Charles's eldest daughter. Such a contrariety of interests must of course give rise to a general war; but it began from a quarter which policy would never have apprehended.

The King of Prussia, almost the only Prince in Europe who had no pretensions to the Austrian succession, yet made his demands, and, instead of manifestoes, asserted them by the sword. His troops invaded the very best province of all the Queen of Hungary's dominions, and made themselves masters of it. The crown was of no long standing in the Brandenburg family: it had first obtained the title of Majesty from the Emperor Leopold; and this honour had little added to its real greatness. The King of Prussia was of little account among the European potentates; and what claims he had to any of the Austrian effects were merely on a private account; and turns on the reftitution of fome duchies, which his family had been poffeffed of by right of purchafe; yet he invades Silefia as a fovereign.

I have heard that Maria Therefa was on the brink of ruin, when her very enemies faved her. The Hungarians, who for ages paff had been endeavouring to overthrow that family, now, one and all, vigorously rofe in her defence.

The Duke of Belleifle told me, that this change in the political world was wrought by that Princess's haranguing them in Latin; "a great change, indeed (added he), for had the Hungarians abandoned that princess, very probably we fhould have heard no more of the houfe of Austria."

Lewis XV. joined with the King of Pruffia to place the Elector of Bavaria on the Imperial throne; befides the diversion occafioned in the North by the election, the King said, that the house of Bourbon was now discharging an old debt with Bavaria.

Were gratitude of any weight in the conduct of Sovereigns, France might indeed be thought to have taken arms in return for its obligations to the Electors of Bavaria, who have ever been firm allies to this crown, and had sustained very considerable losses in its cause.

The house of Bourbon joined with that of Brandenburg to weaken the succession of Charles VI; besides, the exaltation of a Prince of the house of Bavaria to the Imperial throne secured to France an ascendancy in Germany.

It has been reported that the King of Prussia, at first, offered Maria Theresa money and troops to maintain her right against the other powers, on condition of her ceding Lower Silesia to him. Had she agreed to this, the affairs of Europe would have taken a different turn. But,
from

from what I have perceived since my living at Versailles, Princes often make a tender of what they have no mind to give. This the Marshal de Noailles called political compliments.

Frederick had a sure game of it; and it is seldom that Princes ask of others what they can get by themselves. The house of Austria was not able to make head against his invasion of Silesia; nothing was in readiness for preventing it; therefore France in a manner could do no otherwise than declare for the Prussian Monarch. Accordingly the treaty was made; and to give it the greater weight the King of Poland was made a party; he then little thought that this same Frederic would one day invade his dominions.

This confederacy was the basis of several others: the Palatinate, Spain, and Italy came into the plan; Spain wanted

52      M E M O I R S of the
to procure Parma, Placentia, and the Milaneze, for Don Philip.

All the negociations in Germany were committed to the Marshal Belleisle. The poor Elector of Bavaria, who was to be made Emperor, had not wherewith to raise six regiments; so that, in the war which we were now undertaking for his sake, every thing was to be furnished him. France as it were armed him from head to foot; and made him her Lieutenant General in Germany: and thus the successor of the Cæsars became a subaltern officer of the house of Bourbon: however, in consequence of his title, an army was sent for him to command.

Whilst one party was forming to overthrow the house of Austria, another was gathering to prevent its fall. Holland and England, whose common interest it was that there should be a power in Germany able to cope with Versailles, were already making preparations for a German

German war; but hitherto the house of Austria received only pecuniary aids.

Prague was taken, and the Elector of Bavaria proclaimed King of Bohemia, and soon after Emperor. This last title he first received from Marshal Belleisle: thus a subject of the King of France disposes of a throne, which anciently had disposed of all the empires of the world.

This Marshal has since said to me, that the court of Versailles overshoot itself, and that the war had been begun where it should have ended. The armies of the King of France and the Elector of Bavaria, together with the Saxon troops, were not sufficient for keeping the countries which it was necessary to reduce.

The victors advanced without ever looking behind them, till Marshal Belleisle, foreseeing that these victories would soon occasion defeats, thought it proper to be indisposed, and ask leave to retire. Marshal Brogolio was dispatched to him, and on taking a view of things, soon saw into the cause of Belleisle's indisposition. Six years after, these two Generals being in my apartment, the latter said to the other concerning this affair, faith, Marshal, you played me a scurvy trick there.

The Hungarians made good all losses of men; and I have been since told by connoisseurs in military affairs, that of infantry we sent a sufficiency, but had forgot cavalry, which, in Germany, is the more necessary body.

The King of Prussia's drift was to profit by the disadvantages of his allies: he had made conquests, which he carefully kept to himself, regardless of the losses of his allies; but he still wanted a decisive victory to make himself dreaded by the house of Austria, with whom he was already disposed to come to terms. He fought the battle of Czaflaw,

Czaflaw, which terminating in a complete victory on his side, he remained inactive, and soon after struck up a peace with Maria Theresa.

Every thing now went against France; her troops were driven from their posts, her convoys intercepted, her magazines seized, and the far greater part of the army perished by sickness.

Then it was that the French Generals discovered the Prussian Monarch's temper. Marshal Belleisle has often told me, that he had seen into his way of thinking; but judged that the progress of the French arms in Germany would force him to be faithful to the alliance. So true is this, added he, that on the first rumour of our misfortunes, I said to M. de Broglie, the King of Prussia now will shift sides.

One of the articles of the treaty was, to renounce his alliance with the house of Bourbon; and thus the French troops were sacrificed.

For that, said a very knowing man to me, not long since, we may thank the council of Versailles, which, instead of such a body of troops as would have been equal to any undertaking, had only sent small armies, whose sickness ruined them as fast as they came.

The Emperor, being but ill assisted by France, was flying before his enemies; he had quitted his capital, and was at a loss where to shelter himself. His destiny seemed the more melancholy, as he was on the point of being tumbled down from the highest pitch of human exaltation.

Of all his mortifications the most severe certainly was his being forced to become a suppliant to his capital enemy, the Queen of Hungary. He made her an offer to limit his ambition to the imperial crown, and desist from all his claims to the Austrian succession.

But

But things now went fo well with Maria Therefa, that, inftead of a moderate answer to thefe propofals, ſhe very nearly called him rebel, and driving him out of Bavaria, fignified to him that the only fafe ſhelter for him in Germany was the territory of the empire.

England's hands were tyed; Maillebois, at the head of a large body of troops, had obliged George II. to ſign a treaty of neutrality, and the Dutch were unable and as little diſpoſed to interfere in the affairs of Germany.

Robert Walpole, then the ruling miniſter in Great Britain, was all for peace, as underſtanding nothing of war. Every miniſter in Europe, (as a man of great wit, who often came to me at Verfailles, pointed out to me) has his peculiar talents, according to which he gives the bias to public affairs. Walpole's ſyſtem was that the power of Great Britain lay in trade, and that such a nation is to keep clear of sieges and battles.

The king shewed me several of that minister's letters to Cardinal Fleury. In one he says,

“ I engage to keep the parliament to a “ peaceable disposition, if you will bridle “ the martial ardour of your people; for “ a minister in England cannot do every “ thing,” &c. &c.

In another,

“ I have a deal of difficulty to keep our “ people from coming to blows; not that they “ are bent on war, but because I am for “ preserving peace; for our English politi“ cians must be ever skirmishing, either in “ the field or at Westminster.

In a third letter he expresses himself thus:

*“ I pension half the parliament to keep it “ quiet; but as the King's money is not sufficient,
“ and they to whom I give none, clamour loudly “ for a war, it would be expedient for your*

Eminence

“ Eminence to remit me three millions of “ French livres, in order to silence these bar“ kers. Gold is a metal which here corrects “ all qualities in the blood. A pension of two “ thousand pounds a year will make the most “ impetuous warrior in parliament as tame
 “ as a lamb. In short, should England break “ out, you will, besides the uncertainty of “ events in war, be under the necessity of “ paying larger subsidies to foreign powers, “ to be on an equality with us; where“ as, by furnishing me with a little money, “ you purchase peace at the first hand.”
 “ &c. &c.

But Walpole having been obliged to quit the ministry, Great Britain sided with the house of Austria. She was already at war with Spain. The English sent a large army into Flanders, before ever the court of Versailles had thought of garrisoning its strong places, so that the way lay open for them into France; and why they did not enter it, will ever remain a secret. A British minister has since told me, that there were at that time too many malecontents in the army; and that the invasion of France was omitted, purely in spight to a party, who had ever maintained, that the only way to restore the balance of Germany, was to penetrate beyond Flanders. Thus, added the minister by way of reflection, our government which is looked on as one of the best modeled in Europe, is sacrificed to private passions.

Prague, that city on which France had founded all its hopes, began to be despaired of; and from thence it was that, some time after, Belleisle made that fine retreat, with which, every day of his life afterwards I was sure to be entertained; for the old man was very vain. He used to say, it was the finest military performance the age had seen.

All Europe was in a ferment. Italy had taken arms to defend a liberty which it no longer enjoyed. I have been told that that the Pope himself entered into treaties tending to continue and spread the war.

The balance of Europe seems to have been the point in question; but all states aimed at giving France some underhand wounds.

Cardinal Fleury, though he had avoided war, had not studied peace so much as he ought. He had, for some years past, perfectly doated through length of age, and his sticklers took his reveries for so many refined strokes of policy.

Some people in France have greatly cried up his order and œconomy, whereas they were nothing more than the effects of his niggardliness; for so penurious was he, that he never could prevail on himself to furnish his house. All the affairs of France favoured of avarice and parsimony.

On his death, the King became his own master; for till then Lewis had been
in

in reality only the second person in the state: but he made not the least alteration in the tenour of affairs. The same faults went on; so that a judicious person who, at that time, had a place at court, told me lately, that things looked as if the Cardinal had been living after his death, small armies being sent into Germany, by way of œconomy; which all perished like the former. The Dutch, after many prayers and threats, had declared themselves.

I have been told by a person who has made it his business to observe the policy of every nation, that the Dutch have two maxims from which they never depart, the first is, whatever wars arise between the great powers, to be always neuter, that they may engross the whole commerce of Europe. The second is, to watch the moment of France's being over-powered by its enemies, and then declare against it. It was unquestionably in consequence of the latter, that they joined their troops to those of England, and took the field. This last alliance was offensive and defensive, and all Europe found itself in a state of war.

Germany, Holland, Flanders, Piedmont, and every part of Italy, swarmed with soldiers. The Count d'Argenson calculated that Europe had then nine hundred thousand men on foot, ready to cut each others throats, without any known reason. Particularly France was ruining its finances, and losing the flower of its people, to no manner of purpose; for, after all, said an able politician to me one day, on this head, what was an Elector of Bavaria's being Emperor of Germany to us; or Don Philip being Duke of Parma? I shall never forget what I read in Voltaire concerning this: It was, says he, a game that Princes were playing all over Europe, hazarding, pretty equally, their people's blood and treasure; and by a medley of fine actions, faults, and losses, keeping fortune a long time suspended. It must be observed that, amidst all this fighting, no war had been declared; the greater part of the troops slaughtered each other only as auxiliaries.
and

Charles VII. the cause of this general conflagration, had now neither subjects nor dominions left; he was not allowed so much as to bear the title of Emperor, the only honour remaining to him; and his election was declared all over Germany to be null and void; so that he saw himself reduced to accept of a neutrality in his own cause. This step alone ought to have put an end to the German war; but, by my own experience, I have since known, that princes do not make war from any connected system, but only as coinciding with the motions of second causes.

The large French armies were now withdrawn out of Germany; indeed most of the troops left there had been made made prifoners of war. The Marfhal de Noailles has feveral times faid to me, that of all the political errors committed in Europe for thefe thoufand years paft, the German war was the greateft.

In reading the hiftory of that time, it appeared to me, that of all the princes engaged in the war, Emanuel King of Sardinia was the only one who had any fhadow of reafon for it. France was for fettling contiguous to his dominions, a prince of the houfe of Bourbon, whose fettlement muft have been highly inconvenient to him; accordingly, in order to exclude this dangerous neighbour, he ftruck in with the enemies of France. From the beginning of the war, this prince had affifted the houfe of Austria, and now entered into a treaty with it. England fupplied him with money to defray the charges of the war: but the Queen of Hungary went farther, conferring

66 MEMOIRS of the
ferring on him a little state, which did not belong to her*.

France, in 1744, declared war against England, and the house of Austria; and soon after this declaration, a great project was taken in hand: overtures were made to Prince Edward, the Pretender's son, for recovering the throne of his ancestors.

He was a spirited, bold, courageous young man, quite tired of leading an indolent life at Rome, and impatient to signalize himself.

The house of Stuart is so unfortunate, that I question, whether it would be in the power of all Europe joined, to restore it to its antient rights. There seems something of a fatality annexed to that name.

France made all the preparatives in his favour, and gave him all the assistance which the posture of affairs could

* The country of Final, which belonged to the Genoese.

admit of; but the whole design miscarried. A long time after, I, one day, asked the King, whether it had been his real intention, to place the Pretender on the throne of Great Britain? his answer was, that neither he nor his council ever thought it practicable; that this restoration depended on a multitude of second causes, the course of which was no longer under any political direction. The Marshal de Noailles one day said to him in my hearing, Sir, if your Majesty would have had mass said in London, you should have sent an army of three hundred thousand men to officiate at it.

In the mean time, young Edward, eager of doing something to be talked of, put to sea, and had a distant view of the kingdom, the possession of which both fate and policy denied to him. A tempest disappointed his landing, and scattered his fleet; yet the ardent Pretender would, in spite of the wind, make his landing

68      M E M O I R S of the landing good, and fight alone against all England. Versailles had received the most particular assurances, that he had a very strong party at London, and it was on this plan that the expedition had been formed.

It is not very long since I happened to be at the Marshal Bellisfe's; as he was looking for some writings in his closet, he put a paper into my hand, saying, *There, Madam, there is something for you to read;
that letter has cost us a great many millions, which are gone to the bottom of the sea; it was directed to the court of France, by a party of Jacobites, as they are called in England.*
The words of it were these.

“ The tabernacle is ready, the holy sacra“ ment need but appear, and we will go and “ meet it with the cross. The procession “ will be numerous, but the people here be“ ing very hard of belief, soldiers and arms “ will be necessary; for it is only by powder “ and ball, that the system of transubstanti“ ation

“ ation can be made to go down in England.
 “ Depend on it, that we will do every “ thing to the utmost of our power ; and we “ can before hand assure you, that the land- “ ing once made, our party will have nothing “ to do but to pronounce these words : ite, “ Missa est.

In this letter were mentioned twenty-two persons, several of whom now hold a considerable rank in England. Some-time after, he showed me another, the tenor of which is this.

“ Whatever people say, the expedition is “ not difficult : a landing may easily be made ; “ every thing favours the revolution ; the “ advantages religion gives us, will be “ greatly strengthened by political motives. The “ Hanoverian is hated, he is continually “ oppressing the nation, aiming both at abso- “ lute power, and draining the peoples sub- “ stance.”

The

The attempt on England failing, fresh efforts were made in Italy for settling Don Philip; but this the King of Sardinia, who has the key of the Alps, opposed; and the Prince of Conti engaged to make his way through them. This was in some measure warring against God, who has separated the two states by inaccessible mountains. I have had several times read to me in my apartment, the transactions of that Prince in those impracticable climates; the taking Chateau Dauphin, and his other successes amidst those rocks and precipices: and the Prince of Conti in this expedition appears to me greater than many heroes whose fame is high; but great men have not always justice done them.

Lewis XV. who never had seen an army, was now for putting himself at the head of his troops, and determined to make his first campaign in Flanders. On his arrival, Courtray surrendered; and and foon after Menin followed its example. The King himfelf, to the great encouragement of the foldiery, ufed to be prefent at the works.

This firft campaign of the King's having been much talked of in France; on the peace, I asked his Majefty, whether he had found in himfelf a fixed inclination for war. He at firft eluded answering me, and talked in general terms; but a year after, in one of thofe moments of confidence, when the heart lays itfelf open in the arms of friendship, he told me it would have been his reigning paffion; and that, without the recent example of his great-grand-father, and Cardinal Fleury's earneft councils to him, he fhould totally have given himfelf up to war; but that the affection due to his people had got the better of his paffion. Happy government, when the Monarch facrifices his propenfions to the welfare of his fubjects!

Lewis

Lewis was obliged to quit his first conquests, and fly to the assistance of Alsace, Prince Charles having passed the Rhine to invade several of the French provinces; but upon the King's approach at the head of his army, the prince repassed the Rhine.

All the advantages which France had gained in Flanders did not much improve its situation. The Queen of Hungary's alliance with England, Holland, Sardinia, and Saxony was too great a counterpoize. The king of Prussia himself made a convention with Great Britain, but had not included in his agreement that the house of Austria should become so powerful. In treaties between Sovereigns, it is always understood, that the party in favour of whom a neutrality is observed, shall not increase his forces beyond a certain relative proportion: now the house of Brandenburg has more to fear from that of Austria than from any other in Europe;

fo he kept himfelf a mere fpectator of the war, whilft the loffes of France and the emperor were inconfiderable; but on the queen's making a rapid progreff, he armed to ftop her career. I have fince frequently asked the Marfhal de Noailles, one of the greateft politicians in France, why Sovereign Princes make no fcruple to commit thefe breaches of faith, which in common life are reckoned intolerable vices? His conftant answer was, that thefe infractions were neceffary, and that Europe even owed its fafety to them: were it not for fuch failures, the univerfal commonwealth would foon be made fubject to one fingle prince; and this he might compafs, only by once bringing the others to ftand neuter.

The King of Pruffia's firft ftep, after his new alliance with France, was, to march with a powerful army towards Prague. Whilft all France was rejoicing at Frederic's fucceffes, advice came that the King was taken ill at Metz, and the symptoms were grown very dangerous: this caused a general affliction; I remember every body was in tears. These cordial marks of affection are a higher praise, and express his character better than all the flattering strokes with which writers will disfigure his history. I have talked with many who were present at the death of Lewis XIV. and according to them, not a tear was shed in France. Nobody was afflicted with the news; and his death was quite forgot before he was buried; heroism being less esteemed than goodness; and Lewis XV. is the best Prince that ever sat on a throne.

The beloved Monarch recovered, and then the nation's joy exceeded its former consternation. He laid siege to Friburg in Brisgau, and razed its fortifications, as he had demolished those of other places which had yielded to his arms: A policy, licy, which, perhaps, may prevent many wars hereafter.

M. de Maurepas was faying one day to me on this head, that the Turks and Perfians have fcarce any fortified places, and that was the reafon of their feldom making war on one another. I have fince heard, that moft of our wars in Europe were owing to this; that ftates confided too much in baffions and citadels, which hindered negociations from taking effect. If fo, the famous Vauban, whose genius is fo often extolled, muft have done a great deal of mifchief to France.

In the mean time, the King of Pruffia, who, by arming in favour of France, had changed all the German fyftems, decamped from Prague; his army fled before that of Prince Charles, who, repaffing the Rhine in the fight of the French, crossed the Elbe to attack the Pruffians. I never could come at a certain knowledge of this Prince Charles, who directed most of the plans of this war; some speaking so very well of him, and others so very ill, that I have not been able to form any settled judgment of his character.

Marshal Noailles, who knows men, has told me that this Prince wanted neither talents nor genius, but that the goodness of his heart frustrated the qualities of his mind. Instead of having a will of his own, added he, he suffers himself to be directed by those about him; and these are not always the best head-pieces in the world. For instance, continued he, Prince Charles is now at Bruffels as Governor of the Low Countries; but there is a German about him, who turns and winds him at his pleasure, and his pleasure is not always what should be.

The Austrian power, which had been weakened by the king of Prussia's joining with France, now received an increase by an alliance with the Elector of Saxony, King of Poland. This Monarch changed meafures for the fame reason which had induced the King of Pruffia to change.

All parties in thefe treaties deceived each other. France looked for mighty advantages from a diversion which the King of Pruffia was making only for himfelf; and the King of Poland, who had engaged to furnifh the Queen with thirty thoufand men, had a part of Silefia given to him, which now did not belong to her.

Elevated with this alliance, and efppecially the affiftance of England, the council at Vienna hoped not only to recover Silefia, but even to reduce French Flanders. They certainly did not confider that Lewis XV. had committed the fe- curity of it to one, who was moft likely to give a good account of it to the kingdom: This was Count Maurice of Saxony.

Other officers owe their abilities to age, reflection, and experience, but he was born a General. His very enemies (and these at Versailles were not few) have done him this justice, that never man surpassed him for a quick and comprehensive penetration. He instantly discerned what other commanders discovered only by time and circumstances. Maurice not only foresaw events, but also produced them; so that he may in some measure be said to have determined fate. This general made war geometrically, never coming to a battle till he had in demonstration gained it. He was said also to be possessed of the great Turenne's distinguishing qualities, that is, to harass and perplex the enemy by his dexterity in encamping and decamping; a kind of petty war, which seldom fails of leading to great advantages.

This picture, however, is none of my own; I only speak after some of the trade, who

who used to talk to me in this manner.

Whilst the war was prospering abroad, things went wrong at home. The King was at a loss for ministers. The Count de Maurepas put the marine in as good a condition as the English and the state of affairs would allow: but the other departments were in a terrible disorder. The foreign affairs were offered to one Villeneuve, an old man, who had been a long time ambassador at the Porte, where, though his merit has been much cried up, he had ruined the Turkey trade, by turning merchant himself. He came home from his embassy with immense riches, chiefly extorted from the merchants of Marseilles. His principal qualities were management and parsimony. These virtues, so much countenanced by Cardinal Fleury, were greatly in vogue at Versailles. Niggardliness bore the sway. The decrepid ambassador declined the post, doubtless as being attended with more pains than profit. Besides, I have heard those who knew him personally say, that he was not in the least fit for that branch of government. His abilities had been much talked of, for having brought about a peace between the Porte and the house of Austria; but at Constantinople, these sort of negociations are carried on without a minister's having any great share in them. I have it from M. de Maurepas, that the chief instrument in that affair, was a French linguist, one de Laria, who was perfectly well acquainted with the temper of the Turks, and had been employed by Villeneuve in that negociation.

In the mean time, affairs in Italy did not go so well as could be wished; Don Philip had taken and retaken Savoy, but could not make his way into the country of Placentia.

The King of Naples, whom only a captain of an English ship had compelled to a neutrality, because he was not in a condition to arm, broke it as soon as he had got himself in readiness for war.

He had advanced as far as Veletri, where Prince Lobkowitz endeavouring to surprize him, was himself surprized. The loss was great on both sides, and, as I have heard from very experienced officers, the case was then as it almost ever is on such occasions, they both weakened themselves, and without any advantage even to the victor.

Lobkowitz fled before the King of Naples, who pursued him into the Ecclesiastical State; so that Rome itself was in a consternation, on seeing two armies at its gates.

A small event, which fell out at this time in Germany, shews the great injustice of war, in making the belligerent powers overlook the very laws of nations, which should every where be inviolable.

The King had sent Marshal Belleisle to several German courts in quality of his ambassador, and, as such, he was negotiating the affairs of the crown; yet this minister, in his way along the skirts of the country of Hanover, was seized, and sent over to England as a state prisoner.

This general was treated with great regard, and one of the royal seats appointed for his residence; but this splendid hospitality only the more exposed the injustice of that nation.

The Marshal has since told me, that he was not at all sorry for his detention, as it had given him an opportunity of studying the temper of that capricious people in their own country. I have heard him say a hundred times, that a Briton was the riddle of human nature; he would say, it is easy to discern what the bulk of the nation is, but there is no knowing the individuals. According to him, a definition may be given of the English in general, but it is impossible to fay what an Englifhman is.

Vienna, Berlin, and Verfailles, were bufied in the fame plans which had been concerted in the council, when an unforefeen event brought on fome change in the difpofitions. Charles VII. that unfortunate emperor, who had not known a moment's quiet on the auguft throne of the Cæfars, died. If it be nature only which can make men happy, he was of all men the moft miserable. He had long laboured under great pains and fufferings from the badnefs of his conftitution; and ambition, which is ever the predominant diftemper in fovereigns, added to his bodily pains: amidft his infirmities, all his thoughts were about fecuring himfelf on a throne, which the ill ftate of his health was foon to deprive him of. Many were the viciffitudes of his reign. He was once very near being without a place to hide his head. He has often been obliged to quit his capital, and fhift his abode; so that the successor of the masters of the world was sometimes without either house or home.

He was paid by France for being Emperor. He had an allowance of six millions of livres to support a rank which, for that very reason, did not belong to him. They who are acquainted with the causes of the rise and fall of houses, say, that the misfortunes of that of Bavaria were owing to its alliance with that of Bourbon; and this, it seems, will ever be the case of petty states uniting with the greater.

On the decease of Charles VII. France looked out for an Emperor in Germany; for that Charles's son could quietly succeed his father, was impossible. He was not of a proper age; neither had he the means to maintain himself on the Imperial throne, even had there been an intention to place him on it: yet was he thought of, but no farther than in appearance; it was only a feigned scheme. A very sensible sensible man was lately saying to me, There is a meanness in princes which I cannot forgive: they feign to wish what they do not intend, and yet act as if they did intend it. This duplicity has cost the lives of multitudes of brave men, and ruins the commonwealth.

Some fruitless strokes were again struck for insuring the Imperial sceptre to a Prince, who was known not to be able to keep it; but the young Elector, with more wisdom than his father, renounced a throne on which his allies could not maintain him, and thereby did more good to France, than could have accrued to her from the most happy successes of her policy.

A tender was then made to the King of Poland; and in this choice, France had the advantage of detaching from the house of Austria a powerful Sovereign. It has been said that the Elector of Saxony declined the empire: but Marshal Belleisle told told me, that he could not accept of it, and that he saw the impracticability of such a thing, on the very first mention made to him of it. A King of Poland, Emperor of Germany, would have thrown all the northern courts into a flame ; and this double Monarch would have had as many wars on his hands, as there were then Sovereigns in Germany. Thus seeing the impossibility of such an acquisition, he made a merit with the Queen of Hungary of his inability, entering into a closer alliance with her, for placing the great Duke of Tuscany, her spouse, on the throne of the Cæsars. Could it be thought that policy was no motive herein, the King of Poland might be accounted a Prince of eminent probity. He had a defensive treaty with the Queen of Hungary, so that he sacrificed his ambition to that alliance ; a very rare procedure in the history of sovereigns !

The Prince of Soubise, talking over these matters.

matters with me, faid, that the irregularity of the treaties in Germany, after the death of Charles VII. had forced France to be more regular in its conduct relating to the northern affairs ; and ever fince it has kept itfelf to a defensive war, which certainly was its only proper policy.

Germany being left to itfelf, Flanders became the feat of action. Maurice had prepared every thing there for one of thofe bold ftrokes which determine the deftiny of ftates. He laid fiege to Tournay, the King himfelf being prefent in perfon ; this fiege endangered Holland, which on this occafion was eager for coming to blows.

It was with aftonifhment I read in the annals of thofe times, that this tribe of merchants, who have no thoughts beyond trade and parfimony, fhould now have been the firft in calling for a battle, the lofs of which might have been fatal to the republic.

The

The battle of Fontenoy was fought, and the allies lost it. This victory has made a great noise in the world; but by the detail which a general officer at my desire gave me of it, I do not find it to be one of those events which greatly heighten a nation's glory.

The French army was much more numerous than the allies, and both the King and Dauphin were present; the presence of these two Princes, thus eye-witnessees of the bravery of their troops, created a second courage, which in gaining victories goes farther than the first: the magazines were full; the soldiers wanted for nothing; the household-troops were there; and the whole was commanded by an experienced general, whom the troops idolized, as capable of the greatest enterprizes: the Princes of the blood, the Dukes, Peers, and almost all the nobility of the kingdom, fought along with the soldiery, sharing their dangers and glory;

in.

in a word, the whole French monarchy was present at Fontenoy. If, with all these advantages, the allies had got the better, there would have been an end of the monarchy ; for the enemy was marching to the gates of Paris. I am far from intending here to lessen the glory of Marshal Saxe, who conducted the action.

He has often given me an account of it since the peace, and I find that here, tho' then very low in health, he surpassed himself. His thoughts were every where, and he remedied every thing : whatever an able commander could do, he really performed. Some persons of the trade, however, have affirmed to me, that very great faults were committed that day ; and that to repair them, it was frequently necessary to disobey the General's orders. The Duke de Biron took on himself to keep the post of Antoin, though he had been expressly ordered to quit it. But in my opinion, one of the most considerable was, leaving the King and the Dauphin, during the whole action, on the spot where they had placed themselves. A general rout, and this rout was two or three times very near happening, would have exposed France to the worst of misfortunes.
of

90      M E M O I R S of the

It has been said in several histories, that the Marshal was so confident of gaining the battle, that he made no doubt of it; but he has often told me himself, that two or three times he apprehended it lost, and that he had always doubted of the victory till the household had charged. One evident proof of his uncertainty was, his sending two or three times to the King to withdraw.

I was extremely uneasy about this important event, when a letter was brought me from his Majesty. I opened it with trembling hands, and found it as follows :

From

From the camp at Fontenoy, an hour after the battle.

“ Madam,

“ I ſaw all loſt, till Marſhal Saxe re“ trieved all : he has ſurpaſſed himſelf in “ this action ; my troops fought with in“ vincible courage; the houſhold eſpecially “ performed wonders ; I owe the victory “ to that corps. The French nobleſſe “ fought under my eye ; it was with plea-“ ſure I beheld their heroic valour.”

* * * * *
* * * * *
* * * * *

“ Theſe three lines were in cyphers.

“ This letter was very acceptable, and removed all my fears.

From the time of the King’s departure from France, I had often converſe with the Abbe de Bernis, who had been recommended to me to keep me company during the King’s abſence.

He

He had been introduced into the great world by women; for he had all those little talents with which our sex are so taken, compliance, affability, genteel ways, suppleness, gaiety, fluency of speech, a smooth tongue, a pretty knack at verifying, and all those qualities set off with a very handsome person.

This Abbe was never at a loss for well-turned compliments to the ladies; so that he was always welcome among the sex. As in our first conversations he never dropt the least intimation about preferment; I imagined that, at last, I had met with a truly worthy person, one whose noble soul soared above riches and honour. But I was mistaken; this Abbe was eaten up with a desire of court distinction, concealing an unbounded ambition under a hypocritical disinterestedness. His apartment, as I have been informed, was, as it were, a perfect warehouse of memoirs; some related to the farms

farms of the revenues, others to œconomy, some concerning war, some the navy, and others the finances. He had a wonderful readiness at forming projects. He could scheme any thing he had a mind to.

The action of Fontenoy led the way to other conquests in Austrian Flanders, and the Flemings every where received Lewis XV. with the loudest acclamations. I have read in most of the revolutions of the world, that the people greatly rejoice at a change of masters.

This victory caused a general revolution; the Germans and English determined to break into the kingdom. They made their way by Provence and Bretagne, but they only shewed themselves. The Austrians passed the Var, and then repassed it. The English landed and returned to their ships. Our modern history is full of these military follies. Posterity will ever be at a loss why General Sin-

Sinclair, who commanded in this expedition, after bringing a French city to capitulate, moved off without reaping the fruits of the capitulation.

They who shall read the annals of our age, will scarce believe that the cabinets of Europe could have committed so many faults, and that the Generals of armies could have fallen into so many errors.

The Genoese, who had introduced the Spaniards into Italy, were forsaken by them; so that the state of Genoa was invaded by the Austrians, who even made themselves masters of the capital. They first required of the Genoese what money they had, and after stripping them, demanded still more.

In the mean time the German army was in pursuit of the French and Spaniards, and crossing the Var after them, took post in Provence. Botta, in whose care the city had been left, and who was at St. Peter des Arenes, forgot that he had no army to keep it, and that what remained in that suburb, was only a sickly-half-dead multitude; the consequence of which was a sudden revolution, too strong for him to suppress.

The Genoese, whom a large army had awed into submission, recovered their freedom on its departure. Here Botta was guilty of a great oversight; he proposed to the senate to join him against the rebels, as he called them, not perceiving that they underhand encouraged the insurrection: they readily promised to act in concert with him; but this was only to give the people time to gather and unite their strength: it was too late when the general came to be aware of their design; he fled with such precipitancy, as to leave all his magazines behind.

The King shewed me a letter sent to court from a Genoese Senator, giving a particular account of the whole transaction;

tion; the beginning, progress, and end of the scheme laid for shaking off the Austrian yoke. The great council had for some time secretly promoted it. It was not letting the Genoese to draw cannon, which occasioned its revolution; it might indeed hasten the execution of it; but the plan had been concerted long before: thus is posterity often misled in histories, attributing to accident what was the effect of premeditated design.

This deliverance was attended with another happiness to Genoa; it had at that time no citizen who could have deprived the Republic of its liberty. The juncture was extremely favourable; the people had got the whole power of the state into their hands. Now I have heard our politicians say, that on such junctures, giving money, and granting privileges, will carry every point.

This revolution, which seemed only a private concern, changed the system of general

general affairs. The Austrians, who intended to besiege Toulon, and lay Marseilles under contribution, were obliged to repass the Var, for want both of shelter and provisions.

The court of Vienna, inflamed at this event, blocked up Genoa, and threatened the inhabitants with the severest treatment, if they did not immediately surrender; but the Genoese, being supported by the French, made a vigorous resistance, without being intimidated by menaces; and Boufflers, and afterwards the Duke de Richlieu, were sent to command there. M. Maurepas has often told me, that it was a great oversight in the English, who blocked up Genoa by sea, in not having a number of flat-bottomed boats to hinder any French succours from getting into Genoa.

This precaution would have changed the whole disposition of affairs in Italy. Genoa, then incapable of any further re-

VOL. I. F                      sistance, sistance, must have surrendered to the Austrians, and the Infant Don Philip, the subject of the war, would never have seen Parma and Placentia.

Lewis XV. after taking seven fine cities in Flanders, returned to Paris; and it may be said that never was such joy displayed in that city, as at the sight of this Prince; every street rang with shouts of gladness and applause.

Amidst the many checks which England had met with in Flanders, the Pretender conveyed himself into Scotland. As he had neither armies nor ships, some courtiers said, he had swam thither. It was not very difficult to foresee the issue of this enterprize, every step and circumstance of it being irregular. A very intelligent man told me at that time, that the most fortunate thing which could happen to the Pretender, would be to get out of Scotland as clandestinely as he got in: but he was a young man, rather

rather fond of executing his projects in a singular manner, than concerned about the success of them.

This enterprize, however ill conducted, had one advantage for Versailles, that it caused a diversion in England. France has always made use of the house of Stuart for its private views. I am sorry that George II. who wanted neither courage nor firmness, should have shewn any uneasiness at it. An English nobleman told me, that he caused the London militia to take an oath, that they did not in any-wise believe that the pope had ever a right of causing Princes to be murdered. He also had the records of Rochester searched for the form of the excommunication anciently denounced by the Popes, to stimulate the English against the see of Rome. I would not have Princes stoop to trifles, which always betray a weak mind; a prince on the throne should act with magnanimity.

The Pretender published a manifesto in vindication of his rights, addressed to the people of England; but this manifesto contained only empty words, whilst George had on his side troops and cannon.

Marshal Belleisle more than once took notice to me of a remarkable passage in this manifesto. Prince Edward there owns that the house of Stuart lost the English throne in some measure by its own fault, and promises amendment. If, says he, the complaints formerly brought against our family did take their rise from some errors in our administration; it has sufficiently expiated them.—Young Edward took possession of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, in his father's name, declaring himself regent. For England well and good; but thus to make a king of France, was too hasty. Those titles, however, resting on no surer grounds than the possession, as quickly disappeared.

At

At this time France endeavoured to keep the Dutch neuter; both courts published manifestoes, and the ministers negotiated: but this project of neutrality produced only a fresh paper war. The Abbe de la Ville presented memorials drawn up with great pomp and accuracy of stile, and he was answered with an elegant conciseness; but fighting still went on.

The face of affairs in Germany had changed; the King of Prussia acknowledged the Great Duke of Tuscany Emperor, and made his peace with the house of Austria. I have often heard a smart saying of Marshal Belleisle on this head. I very well knew, said he, that this man, who is so fond of war, would incline to peace on the first opportunity to his advantage.

M. Soubise more than once said to me, That Monarch would have owned the Pope for Emperor, had any Sovereign in Germany given him on'y a hundred square acres of land. This peace was so far advantageous to France, as it diminished the power of the house of Austria. Apparently Italy alone would be the sufferer, as it was to be supposed that the Queen of Hungary, being quite at leisure in Germany, would be for fighting on the other side the Alps. She sent reinforcements to the Low Countries, which, however, could not hinder Marshal Saxe from taking Bruffels. It was then that Lewis XV. to compleat the conquest of Austrian Flanders, set out to command the army in person.

Our progresses were very rapid; the King's presence, and the soldiers confidence in Marshal Saxe's abilities, made every thing easy. It was otherwise with the Pretender in Scotland, who fled before the enemy, and at length lost a decisive battle against the Duke of Cumberland.

In

In these circumstances it was that M. d'Argenson wrote, though indirectly, to the English government, in favour of young Edward. A man of wit has since shewed me how extremely ridiculous this was; for had there been a design that Edward should not out-live his temerity, a better method could not have been invented for having him made away with.

That minister represented him to the court as a relation of the King's, for whose person and qualities this Monarch had the highest value. He insisted that King George was a Prince of too much equity, not to perceive the Pretender's son's merit: This manifesto afterwards told the English; that they ought to admire him for those qualities of an eminent patriot, which so conspicuously shone in him. It then proceeded to the dangerous consequences which might result to England, from any severe treatment to young Edward, &c. They did not see that this declaration must have produced a quite contrary effect to that proposed. The Pretender's crime was not his coming over to Scotland, but in being France's ally. Consistent people said, either Prince Edward is a rebel, or King George is an usurper; and Sovereigns should not countenance rebels, nor solicit usurpers.

The invention of this intercessory letter is fathered on a Cardinal, who being a member of the sacred college, was for securing the Pretender's retreat; whereas it was the very way to obstruct it. Accordingly England, making no account of this manifesto, set a price on his head, and some Lords who had taken up arms for him, were publicly beheaded.

Whilst all the Princes of Europe were at war together, their ministers were repairing to Breda, to negotiate a peace.

This

This necessarily increased the bufinefs of cabinets, having both military and pacific operations on the carpet. The dearth of minifters ftill continued in France; none could be found capable of healing the public misfortunes. M. d'Argenfon, who had the foreign affairs, only increased the confufion. They were committed to M. de Puyfieux, who was then at Breda, where he was ordered to feign great zeal and affiduity in bringing about a definitive treaty; this was only a feint, he was in reality employed at Verfailles. On his nomination, he faid to the King, Sire, I will do all I can, but I beg your Majefty to believe that I cannot work miracles.

Marfhall Saxe humoroufly faid, None but a faint or a devil can fet the French adminiftration right. This gave occafion to a courtier afterwards to fay, that we muft be without friends, both in hell and heaven; this fo much wanted faint or devil having not yet made his appearance in France.

Marshal Belleisle, having driven the Austrians out of Provence, returned to Versailles, to give the King an account of his operations. He had a strange passion for signal projects; and he proposed several to his Majesty, the least of which was to deliver Genoa, to make Spain mistress of the greater part of Italy, and strip the King of Sardinia of all his dominions, &c.

He was sent again to Provence, where the sum of his exploits amounted only to the taking of the small castle of Saint Margaret's island. A man of genius was lately saying to me, that if good chimerical projects, and imaginary plans, made a man great, M. Belleisle was indisputably the greatest man in Europe.

In the mean time Holland, having created a Stadtholder, determined on the continuance of the war. I saw that Lewis XV. was manifestly affected with this news, whether from a concern for his people, or that the elevation of the Prince of Orange disconcerted his projects. He said in my presence to a courtier, These Dutchmen are terrible folks; I wish their republic was a thousand leagues from any of my frontiers; it gives me more trouble than all the rest of Europe put together.

con-

France having now no hopes of bringing the United Provinces to a neutrality, thought of invading them; and politicians said, that it was the only way left to restore the balance in Europe, which had been lost by the continual advantages of the English at sea.

Effectual measures were taken for the invasion. The King won the battle of Lafeldt. At the same time it was determined to besiege Bergen-op-Zoom. This expedition was committed to count Lowendahl, who merrily promised to make a present of it to the King on St. Lewis's day. Bergen op-Zoom was taken, which threw the Dutch into the greatest consternation, as they had all imagined the carrying of that place to be an impossibility. This event shewed, that in war there is no such thing as certainty, its operations being ever subject to the caprice and inconstancy of fortune.

The congress at Breda was removed to Aix-la-Chapelle; but the courts still continued planning sieges and battles. Whilst the plenipotentiaries were settling the preliminaries, the levies for fresh troops went on with all possible vigour, and France prepared for war more than ever; but the difficulty was to procure soldiers. It has been affirmed to me, that there were large country-towns in France, which could not furnish so much as one militia-man; so that it became necessary to make the married men carry arms,

arms, though this was hurting posterity. All manner of taxes and imposts were also contrived to supply the want of money. M. Machault, comptroller-general, who had succeeded M. Orry, proposed expedients, but all of a very destructive tendency. The parliament clamoured, and openly declared in its representations, that if all the edicts concerning the finances took place, as proposed, the kingdom was undone; but it received for answer, that great evils required great remedies; and this silenced it.

At length a way being opened into Holland, by the taking of Bergen-op-Zoom, and Marshal Saxe threatening to put an end to the republic; on the other hand, the southern provinces of France being reduced to a starving condition; this, with other circumstances, disposed the several powers to sign preliminaries of peace, which was soon followed by a definitive treaty. Such a situation of things pro-

promoted the public tranquility more than all the studied harangues of the plenipotentiaries at Aix la-Chapelle.

I had the treaty read to me at Versailles; all the articles appeared very suitable to the present state of Europe, except that of Canada. It seemed to me that the appointing commissioners to settle that great affair, would only perplex it the more. I spoke of it to Marshal Belleisle, who told me that article was a state secret: we could have given it another turn, but this is best for us; it leaves things in America as they are, and we have twenty Savage nations in Canada who will revenge our loss. This revenge some years after cost us the game.

The Prince de Soubise told me some time after, that this peace had been a child of necessity; that there was not one of all the signing Princes, who could not have wished that the war had continued.

tinued. Yet I can take upon me to say, that the King of France was of a different mind. He was visibly more gay than usual, and the great joy of his heart displayed itself in his countenance.

Thus at length the public calamities were suspended. Genoa, which under the Duke de Richlieu had continued to defend itself against the Germans, grounded its arms. The Spaniards and French, after being in continual action to settle Don Philip in Italy, discontinued their operations; and it was agreed that every thing should remain quiet till the publication of the definitive treaty. I longed for it more than any minister in Europe. The King had no quiet; the concerns of his crown and personal glory kept him in Flanders, and took up all his thoughts, never returning to Versailles till the campaign was quite over. My private satisfaction I could have willingly sacrificed to the happiness

112 MEMOIRS of the
ness of the state, but sieges and battles only encreased the public distresses.

New lotteries and new taxes were established to raise the means for signing the peace; thus the public ease began with draining them to the last drop.

The Pretender's son, who seemed quite forgotten, now makes his appearance again. Concluding, as he well might, that nobody would think of him at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle; he began by protesting against every thing which should be done there. So little regard was paid to the manifesto which he caused to be set up, that all parties signed without minding his protestations. To this opposition he added another still more extravagant at Paris, refusing to comply even with the King's express orders.

One of the first articles laid down between England and France, had been, that the Chevalier de St. George's son should should quit the kingdom. Lewis XV. feveral times fignified to him the indifpenfable neceffity he was under of adhering to the agreement. Prince Edward plainly told thofe who firft mentioned the King's pleafure to him, that he would not comply. I have often heard the excufe he gave for this refractorinefs. The King of France, faid he, promifed me that I fhould always find an afylum in his dominions; for this I have his fign manual in my pocket. A Prince who has a fense of honour, knows what obligations his word lays him under, and how greatly he exposes himfelf in violating it.

He treated with the King of France as with a private gentleman. He forgot that Sovereigns may fail in their word, without any breach in their honour, the good of their people fo requiring. The Pretender's fon was taken into cuftody, as he was going to the opera. Strange reverse of fortune! On his arrival in France,

France, he had been received with great joy, and marks of consideration. I was something concerned for this young Prince's fate, and dropped a word or two about him to the King, who answered me with some heat, What would you have me do, Madam? Should I continue the war with all Europe for Prince Edward? England will not allow him to be in my dominions; it was only on this condition, that she came into the peace. Should I have broke off the conference at Aix-la-Chapelle, and distressed my people more and more, because the Pretender's son is for living at Paris?

It must be owned that this Prince shewed an obstinacy beyond example. The King sent all Paris to represent to him the state of affairs, and express the concern it gave him, that he was obliged to remove him from his court. Though these messages were delivered to him in the King's name, his answers were so many menaces. The Count de Maurepas pas spoke to him on this occasion, in the following words :

“ It is with the greatest grief that the “ King sees himself obliged to desire “ your Highness to quit his dominions.
 “ I come in his name to assure you that “ no other consideration than the welfare “ of his subjects would have prevailed “ on him to take this step. You would “ have seen him inflexibly supporting “ your claim, had not the unhappy turn “ of the war laid him under a necessity “ of yielding to the present juncture.
 “ The greatest Monarchs cannot always “ do as they would. There are critical “ seasons where policy requires them to “ be pliant. Your Highness knows that; “ since the unhappy time when the “ Stuart family lost the crown of Eng“ land, the Bourbon family has made se“ veral efforts for their restoration. You “ ought to take his intentions kindly, “ rather than blame his inability. I “ wish

“ with you had been witness to his con“ versation with me, when he called “ me into his closet to give me his or“ ders, by which I was to signify to you “ his desire that you will quit the king“ dom ; it must have affected you.
 “ He sincerely laments your situation, “ but he cannot turn the tide of fate ;
 “ and should you force him to take “ violent measures, it would give him “ the deepest concern.

“ Lewis XV. has sent me to you, not “ as a King, not as a master, but as an “ ally, and as a friend ; and, what is more,
 “ he directed me to ask it of you as a “ favour, that you would leave his do“ minions.”

Prince Edward was very laconic in his answer, drawing a pistol out of his pocket, and vowing to shoot the first man that should offer to lay hands on him.
 The archbishop of Paris likewise conjured him in the name of God and the Pope,

Pope, but with no greater effect; religion had no more weight with him than politics, fo that the extremity which the King would have avoided, became neceffary. The Chevalier de St. George's fon was arrested as he was going to the opera.

The enemies of France failed not to exclaim againft this violence, exaggerating it with the moft odious appellations.

On fearching his houfe, it was found turned into an Arfenal. He had arms enough to ftand a fiege in form. It was talked at court that he had determined to fight fingly himfelf againft a whole regiment, and then fet fire to a barrel of powder, which communicated with others, and thus blow up himfelf, with all that belonged to him. The King, on being told this, faid, "A very ill-timed bravery, indeed!"

The peace, however, fpread an univerfal joy through all ranks. There were only only two men in the kingdom who were not satisfied with it, the Marshals Saxe and Lowendahl. The former expressed his discontent to the secretary of war in this manner: “ After the battle of Fontenoy, said he, we were in a fair way of making ourselves masters of Holland, and putting an end to that troublesome republic; for these merchants, with their shipping and their wealth, are the mischief-makers of Europe; they are the necessary allies of our natural enemies the English. The great work of their destruction was nearly finished; why did we not go through with it? If we again give the republicans time to fortify themselves, they will be as daring as before; and the time may come when France with all its forces will not be able to bring them to reason. Destroying Holland is cutting off England’s right arm; and every body knows, that all “ France’s

“ France’s policy should center in weak“ ening Great Britain.

“ Of what consequence has the victory “ of Fontenoy been? What is France
“ the better for the taking of Bergen-“ op-Zoom? All those efforts of cou“ rage, all the lives of so many “ gallant officers who fell in Flanders, “ were purely thrown away. If these “ places were to be restored, and “ the Dutch and the house of Austria “ to be put on the same footing as each “ of them was before the war, it had “ been much better there had been no “ war at all. France’s giving back its “ conquests, was making war against her“ self; her very victories have ruined her; “ her enemies have retained all their for“ mer strength, whilst she alone has “ weakened herself. Her subjects are “ fewer by a million, and her finances “ reduced to little or nothing.”

These speeches reaching the King’s ears,

ears, he said, “I understand the language “ of those generalissimos ; they are for “ ever dwelling on red-hot bullets.”

The count de St. Severin d'Arragon, who had made the peace, undertook to demonstrate the fallacy of such reasonings; and the King has often repeated to me his arguments. “Sire, said he, the “ conquest of Holland made no part of “ the plan of this war. All France aimed at, was to keep the Dutch from “ declaring. The end of our many sieges “ and battles, was not to destroy their “ republic, but only to bring it to pacific terms; so that in forcing them to “ lay aside their arms, the council of “ state's view is fully answered.

“Your Generals will have it, that after “ the battle of Fontenoy, and the taking “ of Bergen-op-Zoom, the United Provinces might easily have been overrun, and the States-General have been “ brought under the dominion of France.

“ They

“ They are mistaken ; the weapons of “ despair are invincible. To compel a “ people to the neceffity of being con“ quered, is the ready way to lofe a con“ queft. The fovereignties once fettled, “ are no longer fubject to deftruction ;
 “ they are reciprocal counterpoizes ; “ fhould only one fall under the power “ of another, the whole balance of Eu“ rope would be deftroyed. It is long “ fince war has afforded any of thofe de“ cifive blows, which, in the time of the “ Romans, changed the face of the poli“ tical world. A province may be maf“ tered, but the invading of kingdoms “ is out of date.

“ Granting, Sir, that the ardour of “ your troops, breaking through the “ common ways, had reduced Holland, “ it would have been a conquelt not “ only ufelefs, but have thrown France “ into fresh troubles ; all Europe, in a “ body, would have declared war againft VOL. I. G “ you.

“ you. The great powers, jealous of the “ house of Bourbon, have long been “ watching an opportunity of giving it “ a decisive blow.

“ Right policy, instead of making a “ noise, silently takes a bye-way to its “ ends; let us insensibly weaken the “ Dutch, but never think of destroying “ them. They are a barrier against the “ great northern powers. They secure us “ from the incursions of the Germans, “ whom the Romans themselves could “ not check, and who at last over“ threw the empire of the Cæsars.

“ But a great deal is said about the “ easiness of our conquering, and not a “ word how easy it was to conquer us.
 “ What induced me, Sire, to put the “ finishing hand to the great work of the “ peace, is the disorder of the finances, “ the depopulation of the state, and the “ scarcity of provisions.

“ The

“ The Comptroller-general has acquainted me that he knows not where to find any more money. The intendants of the provinces have wrote to the war-office, that it is utterly impossible to raife another militia; to which the intendant of Guienne adds, that in his province the people are starving; those, Sire, were my motives for hastening the conclusion of the peace.”

These reasons, however, did not prevail with the great men of the army, who still wanted to be fighting. They were big with hopes, which the peace seemed to quash. I remember Lewis XV. one day talking on this subject, said to me, that he had not a general officer in his troops who cared what became of the state, if he could but get a Marshal's staff.

The King, who had rewarded Marshal Saxe, did not forget the Count St. Severin, making him a minister of state.

This Count, though not a great genius, had good rational sense, which he made to answer as well as a superior understanding. He was slow in business, but sure; and his phlegmatic disposition was better adapted to surmount those difficulties, which ever put fervid and eager minds to a full stand. He was a stranger to agitations; his passions moved in subordination to political laws. Resentment, anger, sallies of passion, spirit of party, with all the other prepossessing foibles which ruled most ministers, were never seen in him. Those he used to call the reverse of the medal of plenipotentiaries. In a negociation he moved straight on to his drift, without stopping by the way. He had a natural love for peace, and thus the more chearfully applied himself to forward a definitive treaty.

M. de Belleisle told me, that he found one great fault in him, which was the want

want of a proper regard to military men, however illustrious by their rank or merit ; for after all, added he, there is no making a good peace but by dint of victories ; and it is the general, and not the plenipotentiary, who gains battles.

France however was quite spent ; the means made use of for supporting the war had been so violent as to break all the springs of power. The ministers complained greatly of the state of France, and openly said, at the peace, that they did not know where to begin the administration.

Paris is not the place where the general distress most manifests itself. The luxury, such as it is, prevailing there conceals the public indigence. There poverty itself appears in embroidery and ribbons, whilst in all the other parts of France it goes quite bare. The court had written into the provinces for a report of the state of things. M. de Belle-isle has shewn me several memoirs of those times, transmitted to Versailles by the intendants of the provinces. The tenour of the first was this:

“MY LORD,

“You ask me for a state of “the finances in this province; that is “soon done: there are none. I don’t “believe that the whole province could “produce a hundred thousand livres “in specie: the poverty is so general, “that all distinction of ranks is at an “end. The louis d’ors are like to be“come scarce pieces, so as soon to be “seen only in the cabinets of the cu“rious.”

The other is from the intendant of a province naturally very fertile, but which could not be cultivated for want of money. His report to the minister was as follows:

“MY LORD,

“There is no representing to your “Excellency the present distress of this “pro-

“ province ; the land yields little or no“ thing ; most of the farmers, unable to “ live by the produce of their farms, “ have quitted them ; some are gone a “ begging, others have listèd in the “ army, and not a few have escapèd into “ foreign countries ; the gentry and nobi“ lity are little better off, being put to “ the utmost difficulty to answer the taxes “ and impositions on them.

“ Of fifteen hundred thousand acres “ of arable land, which usèd to support “ this people, at present six hundred lie “ fallow ; what a diminution this must be “ to the general subsistence, your Excel“ lency readily sees. A village which,
 “ before the war, supported fifteen hun“ dred inhabitants, can now scarce sup“ port six hundred ; and a particular fa“ mily, which was able to feed six chil“ dren, and as many labourers, can now “ provide food only for five. The cattle “ are diminished no less than the men,

“ so as not to be sufficient for tillage ;
 “ and in most of the villages men do the “ work of oxen.

“ I have traced this calamity to its “ source, and I find the evil proceeds from “ the general want of cash : to prevent “ the consequences of this diminution, I “ could wish that the court would be “ pleased to advance to this province, by “ way of loan, the sum of fifteen hun“ dred thousand livres, to be geometri“ cally distributed among the industrious “ poor. This, in my opinion, is the “ only remedy left to avert greater “ evils.”

The third of these memoirs was from another intendant, who paints the depopulation in these sad colours.

“ MY LORD,

“ The king’s subjects are daily “ decreasing in this province ; it “ will soon be without inhabitants.
 “ Having directed the parish-priests to “ bring in lists of the christenings and “ burials,

“ burials, I find that the number of the “ dead exceeds that of the living; so “ that, should this depopulation go on “ twenty years longer, and God continues “ my life during that time, by my calcu“ lation, I shall be the only living crea“ ture, of the human species, in this pro“ vince. Fifteen years before the last re“ volution of the finances, this district “ contained fifteen hundred thousand “ souls, and now if there are nine hun“ dred thousand, it is the most. Yet “ how, my Lord, can it be otherwise?
 “ Of fifty of the king’s subjects, scarce “ two have any thing of a subsistence;
 “ the others must necessarily perish. A “ marriage is seldom heard of; so that all “ the new-born children are the fruits of “ debauchery.

“ I cannot point out any remedy to “ these distresses. In the present crisis “ of the monarchy, it is God alone who “ can rescue it out of the abyss into

150 MEMOIRS of the
“ which the misfortunes of the times “ have cast it.”

The fourth was from a sea-port, whose deputy thus delivered himself before the ministry.

“ Trade, which had been declining “ for several years, is now fallen into a “ total stagnation. Our ships lie in the “ harbours, useless both to the state and “ their owners. We have little or no“ thing for exportation ; the produce of “ the country scarce affords a very scanty “ subsistence ; and our manufactures are “ at the lowest ebb. All our trade is in “ the hands of the English and Dutch.

“ Most of our monied men, who fitted “ out privateers, have been ruined by the “ war ; others so reduced, that instead of “ ten ships, which they used to have at sea, “ they find it difficult to have one : both “ seas are covered with foreign fleets, “ so that the white flag begins to be for“ gotten.

“ All

“ All other nations are carriers to “ France, whereas France carries for “ none. This general stagnation ani“ mates others, and throws our marine “ into a fatal lethargy, &c. &c. &c.”

The navy has been utterly ruined, all the ships being taken by the English, except a few unserviceable ones in the harbours; and the funds appointed for fitting out a fleet are exhausted; but had there been no want of money, seamen were wanting; most of them had died in English prisons, and they who escaped the enemy perished by distress. It was impossible for France, being thinned of men, to furnish seamen.

M. Belleisle, who interfered in every branch of government, said one day to the King, in my hearing, Sire, should all the powers of Europe declare war against you, I engage to raise in your dominions a hundred and fifty thousand soldiers, who should keep them all at bay; but were I to fight an English fleet of a hundred ships of the line, where I should get twenty thousand seamen, I know not.

Another misfortune, beyond any remedy, was the necessary reduction of the troops. A hundred and fifty thousand subjects, who had fought for the crown, at the peace came to want bread: most of them, though they had been husbandmen before the war, were now no longer so. I have several times heard the Marshall de Noailles say, that a countryman, leaving the plough for the musket, is very seldom known to take to it when discharged; and he used to add, that on a hundred thousand husbandmen quitting their labour, a hundred thousand others must labour to provide them bread, otherwise a famine, and the ruin of the state, must be the consequence.

Some regulations were made to prevent the disorders to be apprehended from these reduced troops; but the remedy medy was more dangerous than the disease.

Of all the incumbrances, that of the military rewards were the greatest; money was required to pay the bravery of the officers in ready cash, for the military gentlemen are most impatient creditors. Formerly a St. Lewis's cross sufficed, but it has since appeared to the officers, that a yearly sum gives a greater lustre to gallant actions.

Above ten thousand different pensions were settled on the Exchequer. A churchman who, at my desire, used sometimes to read to me the memorials on this head delivered to me for the king, would often say, that the glory accompanying fine actions must be of very little value in France, as the gentlemen of the army would not take it for a reward. The archbishop of Paris likewise used to say, that victories cost the state more than defeats.

The

The claimants would set forth their services with an arrogant modesty, which gave great offence to the court; especially they who had lost a limb were quite insupportable. One of these gentlemen (it was indeed after several journies to court to obtain a pension) said to me before several foreign ministers, Madam, since the King cannot give me an arm, which I have lost in his service, he should at least give me money.

Once an officer being come express with the news of the loss of a battle in Germany, the king said, Thank God, this time I shan't be teased about rewards. He was mistaken; for fifteen hundred officers, who had escaped the slaughter, came to Versailles, clamouring to be paid only for the great service of their being present at that action.

A lieutenant of grenadiers, to whom the secretary at war had procured a Saint Lewis's cross without a pension, said to him,

him, Sir, your Excellency has tied to my button-hole the sign of my courage, but you have forgot the reality of my bravery, meaning that he wanted a pension.

Some military men in France enjoy considerable incomes only for having been in five or six battles, whilst the subjects of the state have ruined themselves in defraying the expences of the war. Thus do abuses creep into the best foundations.

After settling the pensions, the next thing taken in hand was to retrieve the finances from the terrible disorder into which they were fallen. They who understood the history of France affirmed, that for twenty reigns past the kingdom had never been so distressed; and the national debt being immense, a plan for the discharge of them became absolutely necessary. A sinking fund was projected, but when funds were to be appointed for the sinking-fund, those of the crown were found

found to be all mortgaged. I myself was a witness to his majesty's great uneasiness, when the ministers and counsellors of state laid open to him the condition of things. Gentlemen, said he to them, you had better have advised me against the war, than to make it on such burthensome conditions. Some taxes were taken off; but several imposts, created for the charges of the war, were continued after the peace, &c. &c.

Such was the situation of France after the definitive treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. The domestic affairs of the crown were in no better condition. The ministers had, during the war, assumed an unlimited authority, made themselves despotic in their offices, and behaved towards the subjects with that austerity which is the result of uncontrouled power.

Whilst all Europe was congratulating itself on the general peace, advice came to

to Verfailles that the Englifh were very angry with George the Second, for having agreed to the French propofals. The parliament addreffed him for a copy of the overtures for a general pacification, to be laid before the houfe.

Marshal Saxe being prefent when this was related to the king, faid, Sir, thofe Englifhmen muft be very quarrelfome; they have made a peace with us, and having now no enemy, they are for quarrelling with their King. I have heard very knowing politicians fay, that the divifions in Great Britain between the fubjects and the Prince, are the basis of the general tranquillity of Europe.

However, on the peace, the face of Verfailles was quite changed; that follicitous look which throws a fhade even on diverfions was quite vanifhed; the hurry of bufinefs had ceafed, and the king was now come to himfelf. This tranquillity of the court caufed a great agitation in the city;

city ; several women began to form designs on the King's heart.

Among these was one Madame la Poupeliniere, married to a financier, who had raised her from the dirt, from whence he himself likewise sprung. They had a most delightful and splendid seat at Passy, which was always crowded with the worst company.

I have been often told, that this woman would faint away whenever my name happened to be mentioned. She used to say, that I had thrust myself into her rank at court, that I held her place about the king, and that all the honours paid to me at Versailles, of right belonged to her. She would, at any rate, be Lewis the Fifteenth's mistress.

This was a scheme put into her head by the Duke de Richelieu ; mean time he practised on her heart, to give it a turn for tenderness. This intrigue was carried on with an air of mystery. The Duke used, at nights, to convey himself into the lady's chamber through an opening contrived in the chimney; and this opening Richelieu assured her should, in no long time, conduct her to the little apartments of Versailles. In the interim, this creature, to make herself more worthy of the Sovereign, prostituted herself to one of his subjects; but a chambermaid, in a fit of resentment, discovered the whole mystery. The financier, who had for some time wanted to get rid of his wife, gladly embraced this opportunity; he made the public witness to his infamy, so that all Paris flocked to see the ungrateful perfidy of this ambitious woman.

Duke

The gallant perhaps, now no less fatigued than the husband, made very light of the discovery; and came to Versailles, not imagining that the court as yet knew any thing of the matter; but I had intelligence of his adventure an hour before it was made public. The King was alone in my apartment when he came in; Sir, (said I to him) there is not in all Europe a more close agent in amorous intrigues than his Grace of Richelieu there before you; for to be the more secret with the ladies whom he would bring acquainted with your Majesty, he visits them through the chimney. The King asked me what I meant; I immediately unfolded the riddle to him, which set us a laughing, and Richelieu himself laughed as much as any.
it

Other women likewise laid out for the little apartments at Versailles, and got into them without going under ground. Lewis XV. was very fond of these flighty amours, of which possession is both the beginning and end. But his humours did not in the least abate the affection with which he honoured me, always returning to me more constant than ever.

Since the peace, the Count de Maurepas took a pleasure in censuring every thing

thing that was done at court, and giving it a ridiculous turn. This minifter had his private fuppers like the King himfelf; and here it was where, every night, the crown was turned into drollery.

Several difputes had paffed between us fince my living at Verfailles, and in which he had ufed me with much pride and haughtinefs; his paffion made him forget his rank, and ufe words quite unbecoming fuch a man as he. I flightly intimated it to the King, being unwilling to hurt a man who was of ufe to the ftate.

It has been given out, that my very firft defign on my coming to Verfailles was to fupplant this minifter. Now that fuch a thought fhould have come into my mind, is not poffible. The King, in giving me a character of his chief minifters, fpoke with great approbation of the Count de Maurepas, which alone was fufficient to make me take a liking to him. But a close assiduity in dry and difficult affairs, for above thirty years successively, had extremely soured his temper, so that at times no body durst go near him. M. le Guai, his first clerk, told me, that in those moments he was bristled like a porcupine; his harshness infected his correspondence, scolding those who were a thousand leagues from him, and treating them without any regard to their rank and character. He wrote to the French consul, at one of the Levant ports, in the following manner :

“ I order you, Sir, to write to me no more, but repair to France in the first ship; and come to Paris, where you are to wait my orders, without appearing at court.      I am, &c.”

His caustic temper mingled itself even with his feasts, and would break out even in the midst of pleasure and sociality. It was in these parties that he was most fluent fluent and licentious in satire. I was one day informed, that he had spoken againſt me in very indecent terms, and had even brought in the King. I at firſt determin'd flatly to complain to his Majeſty, but on reflection I choſe to write to himſelf.

“ Sir, I am informed of your ſcandalous “ ſpeeches concerning me, and even the King “ your maſter. As for what you ſay of me, “ it gives me no manner of concern; but I “ cannot overlook any ſcurrility on the King.
 “ I value his reputation; and be aſſured, “ that if you do not alter your behaviour to“ ward him, I ſhall lay it before him, and “ you muſt expect the puniſhment which ſuch
 “ an offence deſerves. I am, &c.”

All the effect of this letter was, that it increaſed his malignity towards me, ſaying to thoſe who were at ſupper with him; Now, Gentlemen, my diſgrace is ſurely at hand, Pompadour threatens me: then, reaſſuming his gravity, he added, by way of reflection, See what Verſailles is come to;
the

the very women of pleasure pretend to domineer there. These words were precisely reported to me; however, I took no notice of them; but some time after, this minister, amidst his cups, sang some scandalous couplets against the King himself, and before a great deal of company. Of this insolence I informed his Majesty, and he was ordered to quit the court.

His exile making a great noise in the world, and a construction being put on it which affected his probity and character, I begged of the King to declare in public, that he was satisfied with his conduct. His Majesty did so; and let this serve as a specimen of his temper; a prince, after being insolently ridiculed by a subject who owed him great obligations, still vouchsafed to shew tenderness for him.

The government was at a loss for a person fit to succeed M. Maurepas at the head of the marine, as now it was become a state mystery. It had been under Maure-

Maurepas's sole management during thirty years. M. Rouillé was pitched on, though no great genius; but he had formed specious plans, and assured the King that within three years he should have a navy of fourscore ships of the line. I wish, said the King, he may make his words good, but I much fear he will fall very short.

Italy was perfectly at ease; the infant Don Philip had made his entrance into Parma: we heard at Versailles that he lived very gaily there amid concerts, plays, and balls. I am afraid, said the King, that young Prince is too fond of balls, and my daughter will be perpetually dancing.

M. de Noailles used to say, that every country dance of Don Philip, in Italy, cost Spain a hundred thousand livres; and his mother had paid the fiddlers before-hand.

The Duke of Modena was restored to his dominions, and had all Don Philip's passion for splendour and entertainments; but the war had ruined him: the Duchess used to say openly, in the palace, his Highness has not wherewith to make one single minuet step. She came to court without shoes, to shew the King the indigence to which the war had reduced their duchy. Madam, said his Majesty to her, I am not in a much better condition myself; but I have a shoe-maker, who, if you please, shall wait on you.

Genoa was free, subject only to its own government, now re-established on its ancient footing. The ambassador from the court of Vienna, meeting that senate's envoy in the great gallery of Versailles, said to him; Sir, the house of Austria forgives your republic its revolution, only intends to be up with it.

Rome was at rest, the foreign armies which, during the war, had been such a burden and terror to it, being withdrawn.

Naples, now no longer under a neceffity of exhausting itfelf of men and money, was beginning to recover: all it stood in need of, was only quiet enjoyment of its fertile foil and climate. Concerning this fmall ftate, I remember a foreign minifter once faid to me, that if ever he had been fo ambitious as to aim at a fovereignty, it would not be that of Germany, France, or Spain, but to be King of Naples. His reafon was, that there the power was derived direétly from heaven; and is the immediate gift of God the Father himfelf.

The nobility ftill complained at court of having greatly hurt their fortunes in the war, and were continually folliciting compensations and rewards.

The Prince of Conti, lately created Grand Prior of France, faid openly, that his horfes had no hay. I wonder, faid Marshal Belleifle, they are not yet dead, for fo long ago as when we were at Coni, his

Highness used to complain of the scarcity of forage.

Lewis XV. did all he could to repair the fortunes of the great by posts, pensions, or governments; but he had a greater concern on his hands, which was to repair that of the nation.

I remember once he mildly said to some, who were unbecomingly urgent, that he would take care of them; Have a little patience, I will provide for all as far as possible; but before I attend to private houses, the great family of the state must be provided for. Another time he said, before the whole court, to a groupe of officers who talked much of their campaigns, and asked rewards: Gentlemen, you have indeed done me great services in the war, but it is my desire you will do me still a greater in peace, which is to allow me first to ease those who have borne the whole weight of the war. You only lent a hand, but they have exhausted their whole substance in it, &c. &c.
but

Marshal Belleisle was not overlooked; besides pensions, ranks, and honours heaped on him, all the bodies of the state, as it were, strove which should pay him the greatest marks of respect. The French Academy itself, on his leaving Paris to go to his government, composed a formal harangue, proving him the deliverer of France. A man of wit has called the members of the French academy the most elegant liars in Europe.

The new naval minister was busily searching for timber, seamen, and money, all over the provinces; but he looked for what was not to be found. On his return to Versailles, appeared the following memorial, by an unknown hand.

MEMORIAL on the MARINE.

“FRANCE should not think of forming “ a navy gradually; such a plan is im“ practicable ; for the English, who have “ an eye to the building of every ship we “ put on the stocks, and build additional “ ships in proportion, thereby always se“ cure a superiority.

“ Thus Great Britain having, at pre“ sent, a hundred ships of the line more “ than France, will consequently always “ exceed us by that number, were we to “ build three hundred ships of war with“ in ten years.

“ We have often set about forming a “ navy, but our endeavours have always “ been defeated by the Britons. They have “ taken our ships in times of profound “ peace, and declared themselves our “ enemies by sea, before any war had “ commenced ; their vigilance in pre“ venting any thing which might affect “ the superiority of their navy, pays no re“ gard to justice or good faith. A King “ of England would be immediately de“ throned by his subjects, should he be “ for

“ for adhering to the treaties made with “ France. It is a tacit maxim with that “ nation, that a treaty is to subsist only “ whilst France builds no ships.

“ Time, which to all other disorders of “ government brings a remedy, here “ renders the disease incurable : building “ therefore is too slow a way ; they know “ at London the very day when any ship “ of war is finished, and when to be “ launched.

“ This part of political strength must “ be formed at once, and unknown to “ the admiralty of England. We should “ without delay apply to Holland, Den“ mark, the republic of Genoa, and “ Venice ; and there, at once, purchase “ a proper number of ships ; and if “ those states cannot fully supply us, “ there is Malta, Algiers, Tripoli, Con“ stantinople, &c. No matter from what “ nation we have ships, or how they are “ built,

“built, if they will but hold men and “guns.

“Herein the strictest secrecy must be “observed, and the purchases all punctu“ally made at one and the same ap“pointed time; for should the English “get any intelligence of our design, they “would either by open force, or nego“tiation, prevent any such purchase.

“The want of seamen still remains;
“but here again we may supply ourselves “by the same method. In time of peace, “the Maritime powers have a great “many more seamen than they want; it “is only making good offers to those “men; for the sailor, like the soldier, is “for the best bidder; his natural Prince “is money, &c. &c.”

M. Rouillé, on reading this memorial, said, The author has forgot the main thing, money. He would have us purchase a navy all at once, but does not provide wherewith to pay for it at once.

A states-

A statesman has often observed, that most of the projects offered at the court of France are deficient in the very foundation. The schemer writes on in prosecution of his notions, till meeting a rock, when all his specious reasonings are wrecked.

M. de Belleisle told me that, in his closet, he had hundreds of memoirs for increasing the revenue and the national wealth, inscribed to him by the finest genius's of the kingdom; and that he might perhaps publish them with this title, A collection of very fine, and very useless projects. "Idle people, said he, often have thoughts which the business of placemen does not allow them to have:" and added, "that though memorial writers do not always make good their points, yet their strictures often put others on effectual improvements."

After the peace, the King had sent the Duke de Mirepoix to London: on which Marshal Saxe said, that this nobleman was perfectly fit for the embassy, having a very handsome leg, and dancing prettily, which might be of good consequence in a court which delighted in balls. The reasons which induced the King to this choice, have always been unknown to me. He never so much as mentioned it to me till it was done. A very intelligent man, whom the king had often employed in state affairs, said to me, at that time, "that M. de Mirepoix was neither supple nor complaisant enough for the English; neither was he sufficiently acquainted with the respective interests of the two nations: besides, continued he, he has a great defect for an ambassador, he is too honest, so that the English will impose on him." He might perhaps have added, with equal truth, that he had not a capacity equal to that employment. M. de Mirepoix had spent his youth in diversions, and the latter part of his life in war;

war; now the science of negotiation is not learnt either at the play-house or in the camp.

This minister's constant note was, that the court of St. James's was perfectly pleased with the peace, and all its thoughts turned on the enjoyment of it. He indeed wrote no more than he believed; for George the Second made him believe whatever he pleased.

The English minister at Paris was my Lord Albemarle, like ours, no great negociator. He had been taught his lesson by heart before he left London, and when at Versailles only repeated it. On any representation of the court of France being informed that the British court was making military preparations, he answered, that it was a mistake. This M. de Puisieux was continually saying to him, and his answer was ever the same. English policy is much more easy than the French, having but one path; so that when once a British minister has got into it, he need but go straight on.

I saw this minister sometimes; he spoke our language better than common, and expressed himself even with energy. He loved expence, and lived nobleman-like; but he appeared to me to have one fault, though indeed it is common to all the English; his very prodigalities had something of parsimony in them. George the Second, who had a great kindness for him, supplied his expences; for though he lived so high, he was very poor: an Englishman, who had known him at London, speaking of his arrival at Paris, said, "My Lord will get a mistress there, run in debt, and die by some accident." The prophecy was fully accomplished: He lived with a girl, borrowed large sums, and died suddenly.

Lewis XV. was more constantly with me than ever; I had brought him to a custom of seeing me every day, and never spend-

spending less than five or six hours in my apartment: I accompanied him in all the journies, and had my apartments in all the royal seats. The more I became acquainted with his Majesty; the more I perceived the exceeding goodness of his heart.

My husband loudly complained of my living at Versailles, and wrote to me a very passionate letter; full of reproaches against me, and still more against the King; amidst other indiscreet terms, calling him tyrant. As I was reading this letter, the King came into my apartment; I immediately thrust it into my pocket; the emotion with which I received his Majesty, shewed me to be under some disorder; I was for concealing the cause, but on his repeated instances, I put my husband's letter into his hands. He read it through without the least sign of resentment: I assured him that I had no share in his temerity; and the better to convince him of it, desired that he would punish the writer severely. No, Madam, said he to me, with that air of goodness which is so natural to him, your husband is unhappy, and should rather be pitied. History does not afford a like passage of moderation in an injured King. My spouse, on being informed of it, left the kingdom to travel.

Though the peace had diffused quiet through Europe, it caused violent agitations in the political bodies of France. The parliament of Paris, amidst its many remonstrances to Lewis XV. exhorted him in a very fine speech, to take off the twentieth denier. The deputies of that body expressed themselves in this manner :

So many millions of men now in indigence, stand in need of immediate ease and relief; whereas, should they be still obliged to pay the twentieth denier, they will be quite unable to lift up their heads again, and repair their shattered tered fortune, and hence a general despondency.

Whole families will be reduced to the most dreadful distress, and thus be afraid of leaving behind them a numerous issue, which would be a burden to them whilst living, and to whom they can transmit no other inheritance than their wretchedness.

The number of children, who are the hope and support of the state, will be continually decreasing, the villages will be thinned, trade languish, and the culture of land in a great measure at a stand. The ruin of the farmers will necessarily be followed by that of the nobility, as their estates will suffer a very considerable diminution; and thus these people, and that brave nobility, whose valour is their soul and chief resource, will be involved in one common ruin.

Count Saxe used to call the deputies of the parliament the great-chamber pedants. They are for teaching the administration, says he, what it knows better than themselves.

elves. They are always harping on the distempers of the state, without any word of a remedy. Once, as the first president was delivering a pathetic harangue before the King, proving the necessity of lessening the weight of the taxes, his Majesty cut him short with these words: Mr. President, let but the parliament enable me to pay off the state debts, and defray the present expences of the Monarchy, and very readily will I abolish every tax, duty, and impost.

A man of wit, and who knows the French temper, used to say, that these useless representations were become necessary, as keeping up the people's spirits, who, without a declared Protector, would think themselves for ever undone.

In Cardinal de Fleury's indolent ministry, and the subsequent wars, the government had not been able to take into consideration an abuse which manifestly tended to dispeople the monarchy. Religion, ligion, in all wife governments, a fource of population, was thinning the human fpecies. All France was mouldering away in convents: every town and village had numerous communities of girls, who made vows againft having children. The following letter, which I received from a nun at Lyons, and communicated to the King, occafioned deliberations for reforming this abufe.

“MADAM,

“I was at firft for writing to the “Pope, but, on farther reflection, I “thought it would be full as well to “apply to you. The point is this: when “I was but feven years of age, my pa“rents fhut me up in the convent where “I now am; and on my entering into “my fifteenth year, two nuns fignified “to me an order to take the veil. I de“ferred complying for fome time; for “though quite a ftranger to every thing “but the houfe I was in, yet I fufpected “there

“ there must be another kind of world “ than the convent, and another state “ than that of a nun ; but the sister of “ Jesus’s heart, our mother, in order to “ fix my call, said to me, that all wo“ men who married were damned, be“ cause they lie with a man, and bore “ children : this set me a-crying most “ bitterly for my poor mother, as burn“ ing eternally in hell for having “ brought me into the world.

“ I took the veil ; but now that I am “ twenty years of age, and my constitution “ formed, I daily feel that I am not made “ for this state, and think I want some“ thing ; and that something, or I am “ much mistaken, is a husband.

“ My talking continually of matri“ mony sets the community a-madding ;
 “ the sister of the Holy Ghost tells me, “ that I am Jesus Christ’s spouse ; but,
 “ for my part, I feel myself much in“ clined “clined to a second marriage with a “man.

“On a young girl’s coming into a con“vent, half a dozen wheedlers get about “her, and never leave her till they have “persuaded her to take the veil. Chil“dren are buried every day in monasteries, “whilst their early age does not admit “of any solid reflections on the vows “they are drawn to make.

“Let me intreat you, Madam, to per“suade the King to reform this abuse; it “is a reformation which both religion “and the prosperity of the state call for.
“The sacrificing so many victims to the “avarice of parents, is a great loss of “people to the state, and the kingdom “of heaven is not the fuller. God “requires voluntary sacrifices, and “these are the fruit of reflection. It “is surprizing, that the laws, in settling “the age for our sex’s passing a civil “contract, should forget the age for “making

“ making vows : is reason less necessary “ for contracting with God, than with “ men ? This I submit to yours and his “ Majesty’s reflections : in the mean “ time, give me leave to be,

Madam,

Your most humble servant,

Sister JOSEPH.”

The King thought that sister Jesus’s heart, and sister Holy Ghost, had done wrong in drawing sister Joseph into the state of celibacy, as with such happy dispositions for marriage, she bid fair to have been a fruitful mother, and thus have benefited the state.

To suppress the aforesaid abuse, his Majesty issued an arret, forbidding all religious communities to admit a novice under twenty-four years of age and a day.

Other bodies, besides the parliament, continued setting forth to the court the im-impossibility the people were under of paying the twentieth denier. The states of Languedoc, with a peremptory kind of humility, represented that it was a load the province could by no means bear: the bishops, who usually employ their pens only in mandates, now wrote memorials on the public distress. The King ordered them not to meddle with money matters, and dissolved the assembly. The Duke de Richelieu, who was then at Montpellier, seconded the court's injunctions, and restrained the bishops pens as much as he could.

On being thus debarred from writing or meeting, they appointed an extraordinary deputation to lay before the King the condition of the kingdom. They were admitted to audience; they made their speech, returned home, and the twentieth denier was levied.

A minister of state used frequently to say, that these representations only increased creased the public charges. Were the provinces to pay at first, they would save themselves the no small expences of journeys, correspondencies, and deputations, not to mention monopolies, which, on these occasions, are unavoidable.

The states of Bretagne likewise offered their difficulties; but all the effect of the representations of both was, that the court appointed two intendants of the finances to go and settle the levying of that tax on those refractory provinces.

These dictatorial proceedings of the states led the council to take their meetings into consideration; and, for some days, it was deliberated, whether they should not be totally laid aside. A counsellor of state, who was for the dissolution, drew up a memorial, which the King was pleased to communicate to me. This piece having never been printed, consequently not known to the public, I shall give it a place here.

“ The

“The provincial states are of no use “to France; such assemblies might have “been necessary in those times, when “each province formed a separate king“dom; but France being now united “under one single government, can re“gulate its concerns sufficiently for itself, “without any need of assemblies.

“These provincial states only keep a di“vision between the Prince and the subject, “and are an obstacle to the expeditious “levying and collecting of the imposts.

“On his Majesty’s ordering a tax, “however necessary it be, to defray the “extraordinary expences, these states “are sure to oppose it; and immediately
“the court is deluged with remon“strances, and Versailles crowded with “deputies: the general affairs must be “delayed to issue fresh orders, and an“swer those sent by the states, for their “writings are rather orders than memo“rials.

primariae sunt SVM
sive attribut

“ This suspension of ordinances has “ other very bad effects; the subjects, be“ come accustomed not to obey, look on “ the wants of the state with the coldest “ indifference, and the public affairs go “ on heavily.

“ The members of these assemblies “ are like so many petty sovereigns; “ their ascendancy over the minds of the “ people being without bounds. An “ Archbishop of Narbonne, on his com“ ing to Montpellier to open the states, “ is received with greater pomp than if “ Lewis XV. was to make his public “ entry.

“ In a monarchical state, where the “ whole authority should proceed only “ from one centre, it is dangerous to “ divide it by subordinate bodies.

“ These provincial states likewise affect “ morality and religion; those of Lan“ guedoc consist of twenty-four bishops, “ or archbishops, who thus are absent “ from

“ from their dioceses three months out “ of the twelve ; leaving in their stead “ their vicars, who have neither the like “ regard or zeal for their flock ; and in “ this interval, a relaxation in discipline “ and manners spreads every where.

“ The luxury of these assemblies is “ equally scandalous, every bishop there “ having his court and courtiers, and “ keeping open table. To day the bishop “ of Alaix has thirty covers on his table ;
 “ and to-morrow my Lord of Nismes “ gives an entertainment, to which fifty “ persons of distinction are invited ; and “ so on.

“ The dissolution of the states will be “ attended with no diminution in the “ finances. The free gift, which is the “ principal business of these assemblies, “ may be regulated like a common tax “ levied from year to year.”

The door of the provincial states being thus shut up, that of the assembly of the clergy immediately burst open: it was still the same object, but here discussed in great.

The business, as in the other assemblies, was the twentieth denier, and the free gift: though this body, whenever called on by the King, pleads indigence, yet it knows that it is so far accounted rich, that all its studied speeches, on those occasions, cannot bring the public to think it poor.

It endeavours therefore to compound with the King, and this time offered seven millions and a half to be exempted from the impost. I have heard a person, very well skilled in such affairs, say, that the clergy should not be allowed to compound for taxes; but that if any composition were to be admitted, it ought to be with the commonalty; which, as being most burthened, should be preferred before all the other bodies put together.

The

The affairs of the closet did not interrupt the court entertainments: the King hunted as usual, came to the plays, and every day supped with me in the little apartments. A tender and affectionate friendship now closely united us; desire was superseded by a calm inclination; the friend had succeeded the mistress; our hearts glowed with all the complacency arising from passions, without any of the disagreeable circumstances accompanying them. Several women had inspired Lewis XV. with love, but not one had he met with of a turn to make him feel the delights of friendship, which a generous soul will always prefer. The former is a commerce of pleasures, the gratification of which is almost ever followed by disgust: the second is a mild settled delight, resident in the mind, and if it does not minister any relish to the senses, is more lasting, lively, and refined. The King himself, at this time, as-fured me, that had he at first felt the delights of friendship, he should never have given himself up to those of love. All passion was now subsided in him; for this name is not to be given to those desultory gallantries, when the constitution only prompts to pleasure, without any concurrence of the heart.

This excellent Prince often said to me, that he was happy in having a real friend, to whom he could communicate his satisfactions and his troubles, for kings have theirs like other men; one of his greatest was the distresses of the people, and the impossibility of relieving them so speedily as he could have wished. He laid open to me the whole state of his mind, without any reserved secrets; all his heart was as well known to me as my own: it was an uneasiness for us to part, and we always met again with redoubled pleasure.

The King, as I said in the beginning of these Memoirs, had, soon after my first appear-

appearance at court, made me Marchionefs de Pompadour ; and, that I might remain there with the greater decency, created me a Lady of the palace. This new place ſhould have convinced all Europe, that there was no other commerce between his Majeſty and me than what aroſe from eſteem and friendship. But ill-nature purſues its point, regardless of all probabilities ; and the ſtate-malcontents picked out this paſſage of my life to mangle my reputation, &c.

To return to politics : buſineſs went on at Verſailles with great diſpatch, that the King might the ſooner have the ſatisfaction he ſo paſſionately deſired, of diſmiſhing the impoſts, and making his people enjoy the benefits of peace.

The marine was the principal point in view: M. Rouille had haſtily got together a little fleet, which, putting to ſea, gave no ſmall umbrage to the Engliſh. The British nation, with all its natural composition, is all in flames at the bare mention of a French navy: concerning this, I remember a jest at that time, that the Britens could not close their eyes since France had an eye to its maritime concerns; and that were we to build a hundred ships of the line, not a soul in England would have any sleep.

This navy, however, was but a-beginning, and far short of what was intended. Yet could England ask France, “what was the destination of these ships?” M. de Puisieux gave my Lord Albemarle for answer, “that the King of France was not accountable to any power in Europe; that France was at peace with Great Britain; and that, consequently, the latter had nothing to apprehend from those ships.”

The court of St. James’s seemed satisfied; yet more closely watched our measures.

The

The government's attention was for some time taken up with books; the French, than whom perhaps no people in Europe are more restrained in their speeches, stillily affect to be the first in their thoughts. They print their notions on what comes uppermost, and the government is ever the first thing to fall under their pen. It is said that this licentiousness is owing to the above restraint; and I have heard that were not so many authors sent to the Bastile, Paris would not swarm with them as it does.

Very few of these seditious writings will bear reading; some of them are not so much as worth a lettre de cachet. To make the authors of mere trash the King's pensioners, is doing them too much honour.

Though the assembly of the clergy granted every thing required, it did not give every thing. On which the court sent a remonstrance to that body, which it answered with another remonstrance; but herein it so little observed the bounds of moderation, that the King dissolved the assembly, and confined the bishops to their dioceses. The next day a courtier said in the King's anti-chamber, "that they ought to be sent out of the kingdom, and priests put in their places:" this act of prerogative so humbled the prelates, that they offered to comply with all his Majesty's pleasure.

A nobleman said to the King, Sir, if your Majesty will be no more troubled with the clergy's remonstrances, a sure way will be, to forbid the bishops coming to Paris; they will assent to the free gifts, or to any terms, only allow them to live there.

However, this affair of the bishops disturbed the King; and one day he said to me, with some emotion, They are perpetually ally vexing me. No sooner have I raised a poor ecclesiastic to a dignity of a hundred thousand livres a year, than he sets up for a leading man among the clergy, and votes against the free gift. Sir, said I to him, methinks there is a way of satisfying all. The crown should, on the death of the present possessor, appropriate to itself half of the revenue of the larger benefices. This would be no tax on any one. There is not a subject in France, designed for the church, who would not think himself under the highest obligations to your Majesty, in conferring on him an abbey; or a bishopric, with a revenue less, by half, than what the present possessor makes of it. I take upon me to bring about the composition; I make no doubt but that I shall find, in the kingdom, two hundred ecclesiastics, who will gladly set their hands to such an agreement.

This diminution cannot be accounted unjust, your Majesty having the nomination to all the large benefices in the kingdom; and the giver is always master of his gifts. No complaint lies against a Prince, who, instead of a hundred and twenty thousand livres a year, which he can bestow on one of his subjects, gives him sixty thousand, &c. &c.

These few words, spoken only cursorily, were, a few days after, followed by an express memorial addressed to the Count de St. Florentine, and which he presented to the King.

M E M O R I A L

On the inequality of the taxes raised on the Clergy.

“ It is a received maxim in economics, “ that a geometrical equality in the levy“ ing of taxes lessens the weight of them.
 “ A burden borne by all the members of “ a body is always light.

“ The uneasiness of the clergy con“ cerning the free-gift, and other impo“ sitions, towards answering the necessi“ ties

“ ties of the state, proceeds not so much “ from the impositions, as from the as“ sessments. The dignitaries, who should “ pay the most, always pay the least, “ considering their incomes. . The whole “ load falls on the poor parish priests, “ and other country incumbents, who “ have scarce a subsistence, and are more “ burthened as clergymen than as sub“ jects. .

“ That the assembly of the bishops tax :
 “ themselves, and the whole ecclesiastical “ body, is not a privilege belonging to “ the clergy, but a mere indulgence of “ the Kings of France, granted them “ with a proviso, that the assessments “ should be equitable, and that the in“ ferior priests, who are the King’s sub“ jects no less than the greater ecclesi“ astics, should not be overcharged.

“ The tax is rated by the income, “ which is an iniquitous assessment : a “ priest :

“ priest with only a hundred crowns “ a year, paying a crown, in effect, is rat“ ed much higher than a bishop, who,
“ with a hundred thousand livres a-year, “ pays a thousand : a yearly income of “ ninety-nine thousand livres being ever “ more or less superfluous ; whereas he “ who has only a hundred crowns, by be“ ing deprived of one, must feel it in the “ very necessaries of life.

“ The inferior clergy are the King’s “ subjects equally with the higher. To “ allow the bishops to tax priests, be“ cause they are subordinate to them, is “ a manifest error in government, the “ spiritual power having no claims in “ temporals. The imposition and assess“ ments of taxes appertains to the crown, “ the mitre has nothing to do in it.

“ The whole body of the clergy should “ be taxed once for all, like the body of “ the laity : what tax the clergy can pay

“ may

“ may be easily known ; it is only taking “ an account of the several sums which “ the clergy has paid for these last twenty “ years ; the twentieth part of the “ amount will be a fair yearly tax, as in “ twenty years an exact calculation may “ be made of the periodical wants of “ the state. In this interval, all the re“ volutions may be reduced to a general “ sum.

“ It may be left to the clergy’s choice “ to pay the tax, without holding an as“ sembly : this might be done by a tarif “ on the large and small dignities and be-“ nefices, or the tax might be levied by “ the King’s officers, as on the other sub“ jects of the state.

“ The latter most comports with the “ dignity of the crown, and will likewise “ be more advantageous. As the church “ is daily making acquisitions, and its “ general opulence is continually in“ creasing by donations, the clergy’s pay“ ments.

ments should be raised in proportion to their aggrandizement.

“ This rise of the clergy’s tax would be no more than what takes place in the common imposts. Artificers and tradespeople pay more in proportion to their thriving, though this be by their own labour and industry.”

The American affairs, of which not a word had been heard since the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, now began to employ the court’s attention. The English complained, by their ambassador, my Lord Albemarle, that the French countenanced the Indians in their practices, and, underhand instigated them to molest their settlement in Nova Scotia. M. de Puffieux told the British minister, that the people at London were mistaken; “ The court of France, said he, knows nothing of this supposed instigation; and, very probably, it exists only in the suspicious minds of the English.”

How-

However, the first sparks of that fire, which was to kindle the war a fresh, already began to appear. Advice came from Canada, that the Indians were in motion; and though the cabinet of Versailles did not give direct orders to the French to oppose any such motion, neither did it tell them not to do so. This silence left the commanders to guess how they were to act; accordingly, they did not declare openly, but let second causes take their course.

A minister of a foreign court, formerly allied with France, and who, at that time, was frequently with M. de Pufieux, put into his hands a memorial on this head, which the King never saw, and it was not till long after that I read it.

“ France, said that piece, is not yet in “ a condition to go to war again : things “ should be left to remain as they are, “ till she is able to cope with Eng“ land ; otherwise every thing will be “ ruined.

“ruined. The war by sea will give the “turn to that by land: Great Britain “will chuse this juncture for inducing “the King of Prussia to declare against “France, which thus will have two “weighty wars on its hands, and only “for a continent of no great importance, “and which, at last, it will certainly lose, “for the events of this war may be easily “foreseen.

“The English navy is much superior “to that of France; and the King of “Prussia has two hundred thousand well “disciplined men, ready, at the first or“der, to march, and make a powerful “diversion in Germany; and, with the “addition of those in England, will un“questionably turn the scale in the “north. France is very well as it is,
“and should aim at nothing beyond “keeping itself so, till a favourable op“portunity shall enable it to do better.

“Nothing

“ Nothing in America calls for haste ; “ you will always have time enough to “ make good your claims there : the Sa“ vages are your friends ; they cannot “ endure the English. At present “ interfere no farther than fomenting this “ variance without promoting it ; the “ time will come when you may make “ your own use of it : precipitancy spoils “ the most promising affairs ; whereas “ time and patience bring every thing to “ bear.

“ Don’t imagine that your intrigues “ with the Americans blind Europe ; the “ most clandestine practices of courts are “ always detected. Already, you are “ made accountable for the proceedings “ of the Canadians, though you appear “ not to concern yourselves about them.
 “ It is known to all Europe, that the “ North American savages act without “ any continued design, when not spirit“ ed up and directed. Every body knows “ those “ those automata have no will of their “ own, saying and doing only just as they “ are bid to do.

“ Your navy is but in its infancy, “ scarce begun to be formed, so that a war “ only of two years would totally destroy “ it. Before engaging in a war, there is “ a sure way of knowing whether it “ should be undertaken, which is to “ weigh the advantages of the conquests “ with the disadvantages of the defeats.

“ Should you beat the English at sea, “ which is a circumstance out of all pro“ bability, you will retain North Ame“ rica, which you already have; if beaten, “ and here the likelihood lies, you will “ lose America, and perhaps all your “ other colonies, for one conquest ever “ leads to another.

“ The English, though beginning the “ war only on account of Canada, will “ avail themselves of their first victory “ to enlarge their views: and the court “ of

“ of St. James’s may afterwards ſtrike “ out ſuch a ſcheme of deſtruction to “ France, as perhaps, at preſent, it “ does not think of.

“ A great diſadvantage to France, is “ its having no ally who can help it to “ recover its loſſes againſt the Engliſh : “ the Spaniſh navy is in no better con“ dition than that of France ; and the “ Dutch rejoice in a war between the “ maritime powers, were it only for the “ vaſt advantages accruing to them from “ their neutrality. A continental power “ may retrieve the loſs of a battle by a “ ſubſequent victory ; a more experienc“ ed general, better diſciplined troops, “ or more favourable circumſtances, will “ give a turn to a land-war ; but the ma“ ritime concerns of France are ſo ſituat-“ ed, that a colony taken from it is loſt “ for ever ; its ſhips, the only means of “ bringing it again into the path of vic“ tory, being deſtroyed.”

This

This memorial, however approved by some politicians to whom I have since shewed it, had not the effect which might have been expected; another, afterwards presented to the same Minister, set the same object in a very different light.

It is said that the members of the English parliament being generally of contrary opinions, long debates are very frequent in that assembly; and that these debates produce lights, from which the hearers receive great improvement, and become better qualified to serve their country. It is otherwise in France: here the contrariety of opinions only bewilders the understanding, and increases the confusion.

“ The Canada affair, said the last “ writer, too nearly concerns the French “ monarchy, to be left as it is. Every “ minute we lose diminishes our power, “ and augments that of our enemies.
 “ The war ought to have been continu“ ed, “ ed, had not second causes forced the “ government into a peace; but those “ causes no longer subsisting, we should “ take up arms again.

“ The English will never keep within “ the limits assigned by the commissa“ ries. They will, by skirmishes and “ secret practices, be ever endeavouring “ to come beyond those barriers: they “ must be prevented in time, their “ schemes must be destroyed at their “ very first appearance, otherwise it will “ be too late.

“ The loss of Canada would be an in“ conceivable detriment to France. It “ is that to which England owes its be“ ing mistress of the sea, opening to it “ numberless branches of commerce, “ which it would never have known “ without being possessed of this con“ tinent.

“ Though we have no great navy, yet “ have we shipping enough; a sea quarrel

“rel is not the point, but a land war.
 “It is enough for us to send over some “troops to Canada; the American affairs “have no connection with those of our “country. Should any disturbances hap“pen in Germany, they will spring “from a quite different cause; and if the “King of Prussia declares against France, “it will be for some particular views of “his own, quite foreign to our colonies; “he would declare himself, if we had no “dispute with the Britons about Ca“nada.

“It is not the first time of our having “several wars on our hands, or, ra“ther, it is impossible that we should “have but one at a time.

“Our concerns are so closely linked “with the other powers of Europe, that “on our arming, five or six princes can“not avoid declaring.

“The situation of affairs in Canada “lays us under a necessity of renewing
 “the

“ the war : we cannot continue in the “ ftate we now are in ; the capital effort “ of our politics fhould be to recover the “ advantage which we loft by means of “ the Englifh.

“ Amidft all the magnified fuperiority “ of the Britifh navy, its fuccesses are not “ fo certain as fuppofed. Advantages “ in war depend on a great number of “ unforefeen events. It is often obferved, “ that the certain expectation of a vic“ tory has fuddenly turned into the dif“ appointment of a defeat.

“ England has not had time, fince the “ peace, to increafe its marine ; its naval “ force is, at this day, juft as it was at “ the end of the war. Before the treaty “ of Aix-la-Chapelle, we could defend “ ourfelves at fea, and ftill can : but if “ we defer any longer, the time will be “ over ; for the Britifh navy now is en“ creafing every day. Our’s will be fo “ much “ much inferior, as not to dare to shew “ its face before them ; and then we “ shall be obliged to relinquish North “ America.

“ Let us, without delay, begin the war “ again, and then we shall drive the Eng“ lish out of Canada ; whereas, by con“ tinuing the peace, they will dispossess “ us. This is no time for parlying ; we “ must either give up that part of Ame“ rica to England, or prepare to dispute
 “ it.

“ The savage nations are our allies, “ they mortally hate the English ; and “ shall we delay availing ourselves of such “ a favourable disposition ? A people “ without any fixed laws, is naturally “ given to change. The Canadians love “ war, and despise such nations as live in “ peace : twenty years inactivity would “ give them an ill opinion of the French ; “ whereas, seeing us at war with a nation “ whom “whom they hate, they will esteem us, “and come into a closer alliance “with us than before, &c.”

These memorials made no alteration in the general system; both sides continued to dissemble, and express a desire of cultivating the peace. England applied itself to increase its navy, and France sent orders to Brest and Rochfort, for building ships with the utmost dispatch.

Amidst the most earnest concern to redress the calamities of the state, no expedients could be found for so great and good an end. The people could not be relieved but by abolishing the taxes; and the expences of the state could not be answered but by new imposts: every branch of the government was embarrassed; so that the King often said to me, with a painful sense of such a situation, I know not where to begin.

The advantages of the encouragement of tillage, the improvement of arts, the increase of trade, the discharge of the national debt, were only in perspective; whereas the people stood in need of present relief. Observing that the public affairs greatly affected the King's temper and constitution, I contrasted them with diversions. I may say, the most gay and striking conceits of imagination, for pleasing the senses, were now exhibited at Versailles. In all the entertainments which I gave to the Monarch, there was little of my own; I had people of taste at Paris who furnished me with original materials, to which I only gave a few retouches.

Amidst all my inventions to draw the court from that mournful state which the perplexity of affairs shed on it, I perceived that the King was not so chearful as I could have desired. He had a cloudiness in his looks, which were naturally sprightly; he was, likewise, more thoughtful than usual. Alarmed at this lugubrious scene, I took the liberty to ask his Majesty the cause of so unhappy an alteration. He vaguely answered, "that he was not sensible of any alteration, and that my company still was his chief delight:" the revolution, however, was but too certain.
ed

My enemies having miscarried in their design of inducing the King to remove me from court, by political motives, set religion to work; and no less a person than his Majesty's confessor was put at the head of this cabal. He was a Jesuit with only morality for his instrument; but as that, with a Prince, seldom gets the better of pleasure, he contrived a way which struck my Monarch.

This reverend father employed one of the best hands in Paris, in a picture representing the torments of hell. Several crowned heads seemed chained down in dreadful sufferings; there was no beholding their contortions without shuddering.

This infernal master-piece he made a present of to Lewis XV. The King having viewed it for some time with a frown, asked the meaning of the picture, the very thing the son of Loyola wanted.

“ Sire, said he, the Prince you see there “ suffering eternal torments, was an am“ bitious Monarch, who sacrificed his “ people to his vain delight in glory and “ power. He next to him, whom the “ devils are insulting, was an avaricious “ monarch, who laid up in his coffers “ immense treasures, squeezed from his “ oppressed subjects. This third wretch “ was an indolent sovereign, who mind“ ed nothing, and instead of governing “ by himself, left every thing to his mi“ nisters, whose incapacity produced in“ finite mischiefs. This fourth, whose “ sufferings exceed those of the others, “ his crime being greater, was a volup“ tuous King, openly keeping a concu-“ bine

“ bine at his court ; and by this scanda“ lous example had filled his kingdom “ with debauchery, &c.”

The allegory was coarse, and becoming a monk, who, in the want of the means to attain his ends in this world, has recourse to things of the other life. Lewis XV. who saw into the drift of the picture, ordered the moralist to withdraw, but the impression remained.

This was not the first time that the churchmen had presumed on their office, and abused the King's goodness. A prelate had made him perform an ignominious act of penitence when sick at Metz.

I used fresh endeavours to relieve the King from this return of languor, and had in a great measure succeeded, when a family-concern brought on a severe relapse.

The Dauphin was now in his twenty-second year, which, by the custom of France, intitled him to be intrusted with the affairs of the crown. This Prince had always shewn the most submissive deference to the King his father, but of late had put himself at the head of a party, most of whom were my enemies: they exposed me with all the venom of scurrility, and even brought in the King. Lewis XV. knew it, and this was what occasioned that inward conflict which gave him so much trouble. After communicating his situation to me, he said, And what would you do, Madam, in such a case? “Sire, answered I, I would admit “ his Royal Highness the Dauphin into “ every council, and allow him all the “ honours due to his rank and birth.” Well, said the King, I will follow your advice; and soon after the Dauphin saw himself sent for on every important deliberation.

M. de Machault, then at the head of the finances, left no stone unturned to put put them in a good condition: he was urged on every side. M. Rouillé asked very large sums to form a navy; the payers of annuities were perpetually at his elbow, and his apartment was never clear of those who had advanced money in the late war. He one day said to the King, in my hearing, Sire, I know not how in the world, I shall answer your engagements; every body is making demands on me, and no body will give me any credit.

Marshal Belleisle, to whom that laborious minister often used to pour forth his lamentations, told him, “Sir, I see “but one way for you, which is to make “the state a bankrupt. When a machine “is out of order, the only remedy is to “stop its motion, and to set it to rights “again.”

This advice, however, was not followed; and instead of stopping the machine of the finances, in order to set it to rights again, it remained in all its former disorder. I have somewhere, among my papers, a scheme for discharging the national debt, in which the author, who was accounted a very skilful economist, advanced, that, for the settlement of an invariable order in the finances, the state, every twenty-five years, should declare itself insolvent; and the creditors compound with the King, as with a private insolvent.

“ France, said this paper, will not hear “ of making itself a bankrupt, but the “ way it takes to avoid it, is still more “ burthensome; for when the King’s “ debts grow troublesome, does he not “ lay very onerous imposts on the people “ for the payment of them? Now this “ is a remedy worse than the disease, be“ cause the collecting of a tax, it is “ known, falls little short of doubling it.
“ He extorts from one to pay another;
“ a bank-

“a bankruptcy would ruin only a part “of his fubjects, whereas the means of “payment impoverifhes every body.”

I am not fufficiently acquainted with finances, to determine whether a wife King, in order to make his people eafy, fhould begin by forfeiting the confidence of the wealthy part of his fubjects. There are always fome exceptionable things in thefe kinds of memorials. A perfon of a great genius has often told me, “that fhould all the fine projects, for making France the moft opulent ftate in Europe, be carried into execution, it would perhaps make it the very pooreft in the univerfe.”

The particular favour with which Lewis XV. continued to honour me, drew great numbers to my apartment, fo that I had every morning a full court: fome perfons of eminence appeared there purely to pleafe the King; but the bufinefs of the multitude was intereft. I had brought the latter to give me memorials, as otherwise, I could never have recollected so many different objects. It is impossible for those who live at a distance from court, to conceive the various classes of askers, and what a number of favours the throne has the pleasure of bestowing.

I have read, in an original paper, that Lewis XIV. allowed all his subjects, who had any demand to make at court, to apply directly to himself. Had such an indulgence been continued under the present reign, Lewis XV's whole life would have been taken up only in giving audiences. These memorials I had read to me, and afterwards talked them over to the King.

Besides those who asked favours, I was likewise teased with complainers, and indeed these were usually more in number than the others.

In fo large a kingdom as France, it is fcarce poffible to prevent all abufes; fome neceffarily arife from the very conftitution, and the maintenance of political order. But one complaint fo particularly ftruck me, that I thought it deferved to be laid before the King. This was the difregard of the children of officers dying in the fervice of their country.

A general officer, if no gentleman by birth, though, by his courage, he had fecured the privileges both of the throne and nobility, leaving iffue, they were excluded from nobility; and foon coming to intermix with the commonalty, no trace remained of the families which had performed the greateft fervices to the ftate: a hero's atchievements died with him, his pofterity were never the better for his exploits. This I mentioned to the King with a fenfible concern, and fome time after his Majesty, ever inclined to what was good and proper, iffued an edict, ennobling military officers and their posterity. The different degrees of this nobility were specified in the edict, according to the different ranks of the officers.

No body in the kingdom apprehended that I had any share in this resolution; so that, unless my papers should be looked over, posterity will never know that this establishment, which gave so much satisfaction, was owing to me.

The courtiers were in as great a ferment as ever. They who found there was no pushing their fortune by my means, endeavoured to hurt me. Herein they often made use of indecent, and even insolent talk, besides the baseness of calumny. Several cabals had been formed, and these produced clashing and competitions, which affected the crown, as stirring up discontent in those who held the principal posts of the state.

The

The chancellor de Aguesseau pleaded his great age, and laid down business, as no longer able to bear the weight of it. A courtier, who was present when the King received his resignation, said to him, Certainly, Sire, M. de Aguesseau must be above a century old, for at a hundred years one is still young enough to be chancellor of France.

Several other placemen quitted, alledging that they could not live in a court where every thing was ruled by a woman: but this philosophy was of the latest; they never had any thoughts of retirement, till their endeavours to raise themselves to the very highest pitch of fortune, had miscarried; and some, in their voluntary exile, had set instruments to work, for making their appearance again on the theatre of power, which they had so lately quitted.

M. de Machault had the seals. This circulation of posts, diametrically opposite site in practice, and requiring different talents, has been the subject of much complaint: but the fault lies in ambition. In France subaltern posts are looked on only as introductory to the more honourable and lucrative employments. On the vacancy of any great office, my apartment was crowded with competitors, who all had a genteel competency; but they wanted profitable posts, to make a show in the world.

The round of diversions which I had settled at Versailles, to recover the King from that lethargic heaviness which was growing constitutional, did not break in on general affairs. Lewis XV. daily devoted six hours to business. In the morning he employed himself about the foreign and domestic affairs.

The death of Marshal count Saxe now cast a damp on the festivity of the court. I remember a man of wit, being in my apartment when the news came, said to me,

me, Now, Madam, we shall soon have a war, for he was the only one of all his Majesty's generals whom the King of Prussia in the least feared.

The frequent conferences between Lewis XV. and this hero gave me an opportunity of studying his temper; for there is a pleasure in knowing great men; and his mind was of a singular cast: all his private behaviour favoured of the common man, great only in the day of action; then his soul, if I may be allowed the expression, assumed a new form; it became piercing, noble, and exalted: a new light beaming on his mind, he had an instantaneous perception of every thing. His imagination had nothing to do, the military genius which inspired him at those times was all-sufficient; yet after the battle, all this flame and magnanimity sunk again into littleness and vulgarity; nothing great remained in him but the fame of his actions.

In private life, he addicted himself to sensuality in its most brutish excesses; he was a stranger to that refined love which distinguishes noble from vulgar souls, delighting in the company of women only for debauchery; for all his mistresses were common prostitutes. Whilst he was disturbing all Europe by his victories, the gallantries of La Favart, an actress, allowed him no ease.

They who were often with him say, that he had scarce any tincture of learning; war was all he knew; and that he knew without learning it. Some politicians have thought, that his death wrought a change in the systems of Europe, and particularly, that the King of Prussia would never have renewed the war, had Mauricè been living: it is certain that one man may change the whole scene of our political world.

I have read, in original memoirs of Lewis XIV. of surprising revolutions, brought

brought about only by the afcendency of one mortal. Count Saxe had long laboured with indefatigable ardour in purfuit of a repofe which he never enjoyed; for fcarce had he feen himfelf in that fummit of grandeur to which his military talents had raifed him, than death laid him in the grave. Befides the royal feat given him by the King, in reward of his fervices, with fuitable incomes, he was invefted with the higheft dignities and honours.

This general left behind him an incontestable reputation; his very enemies allow him to have been a confummate warrior; but if he did a great deal for France, France ftill did more for him; he never wanted for any thing. The King's commiffaries constantly furnifhed him with plenty of all neceffaries; he had large armies, and fought in a country which has almoft ever been the theatre of French victories, and where the glory of the French name has shone in its greatest lustre. Farther, Maurice had with him the King's best troops, impatiently longing to signalize themselves. I heard one of the trade, and reckoned to understand it thoroughly, say, that to be a hero, a man should have passed through all the military paths leading to glory; whereas Maurice, in the service of France, trod only one, and that smoothed for him; he was never put to those trials where a commander, being forced to exert all his abilities, approves himself a general.
of

I have read in the manuscript memoirs of Lewis XV. that the great Conde's enemies put the Queen-mother on sending him into Catalonia only with a small body of troops, and those of the very worst. Conde, who knew his enemies views, wrote thus to his friend Gourville: I have been sent here to attack the gods and men, with only shadows to fight them. I shall miscarry ;

miscarry; how can it be otherwise, when the means of beating the enemy have been all taken away from me? Yet this hero, under the disadvantages both of numbers and the climate, baffled all the efforts of Spain.

The death of Marshal Saxe occasioned a revolution in the minds of the military courtiers. They who hitherto had hid themselves behind his merit, made their appearance: all put in for this hero's post, and not one of them was qualified for it.

The King, on the first notice of count Maurice's death, said, I am now without any general, I have only some captains remaining. Lowendahl, however, was still living; but it is said, the genius of those two men was formed to be together, and that the heroic virtues of the latter derived their splendor from the superior qualities of the other. A courtier said, on this
this

this head, Lowendabl's exploits are over; his counsellor is dead.

Whilst Versailles was full of this event, the Pope's nuncio came to acquaint Lewis XV. that the King of Prussia had granted the free exercise of the Roman Catholic religion at Berlin; and that even the religious were allowed to settle, and wear the habit of their respective orders. A courtier hereupon said to the King, Sire, that Prince is for having a little of every thing. Once nothing would go down with him but soldiers, now he must have some monks. Another courtier replied, Since he begins to fancy gowns, let me advise your Majesty to make him a present of all the Jesuits in France. A third added, That article should be kept for the next treaty of peace, and let six Loyolites be exchanged for one soldier. The systematical people, however, attributed this indulgence to policy; for when a Prince is looked on to be

be full of schemes and designs, every step of his is nicely canvassed, and various constructions put on it. Some said that the King of Prussia thereby intended to ingratiate himself with the court of Rome, as, by its intrigues with weak and superstitious princes, it can amply make up its want of temporal strength. Some thought it to arise from a new system of population, to draw Catholics thither from other parts; but the monks and priests of our faith do not increase population, &c. &c.

For my part, I attributed it to the humour for new foundations, which prevails with all the princes of our days. On examining the constitution of the Prussian government, which is an absolute monarchy, the plurality of religions will by no means appear suitable to it; at least I have heard from a very intelligent person, that it is only in republics where where a freedom of religion can be properly allowed.

For some time the King had been more chearful than usual : after so many vexations and fatigues, he now began to breathe a little ; he was at leisure to be often with me, and to hunt as much as he could. Never was a Prince so fond of this exercise. His eagerness in it often fatigued him beyond all bounds. I one day represented to him, that he made a toil of that pleasure, and that it would be better for him to be more moderate in it ; that excess in any thing was hurtful : but he answered, that the more he hunted, the better he found himself. This is a new medical system ; the court-physicians, who are all for motion and agitation, will have kings to spend half their life on horse-back.

But a great satisfaction, which that 1750 justly beloved Prince now felt, was

was the having given fome relief to his burthened fubjects. He had remitted three millions of the land-tax, abolifhed the hundredth denier, and the pence per livres levied on this impoft. Though this was no great good, it prefaged the end of a great evil.

At the fame time, Lewis XV. ordered an inquiry into the nature of the taxes; of all impofts, the land-tax was found to be the moft burthensome, as not proportioned to the real income. The old tax was ftill levied, without confidering any decays, or damages of eftates and lands; many a market-town, or village, which had formerly been able to pay large fums, was now no longer fo; yet the fame duty was required.

The government deliberated on ways for abolifhing fuch an unequal tax, and fubftitute another of a more proportionate affeffment. This had, for fome time paff, been often propofed, but always ways rejected. It was now again taken into consideration, and after the most minute discussions, it was found best to leave things as they were, lest worse inconveniences might ensue. It is said, there are abuses in government, the reformation of which would do more harm than the very abuse itself. This was the opinion of the ministers, and of the King himself; but it was not mine, having always thought that no good can come from evil. We had often little debates about government, for Lewis XV. as I have said in the beginning of these Memoirs, has a great deal of wit and good-sense, and especially a very ready penetration. “ You, Madam, would he say “ to me, look on the political commu“ nity as a private family, whereas it is “ to be considered as an universal society, “ consisting of different bodies, the con“ junction of which constitutes the state.

“ Amidst this immensity of objects, conducted

“ ducted by men of oppofite views and “ interefts; the fecurity and well-being “ of the ftate is upheld by thofe very “ things which feem to undermine it.
 “ In a private family, there is only one “ fingle plan of adminiftration, the abufes “ are few, eafily animadverted on, and “ the reformation of them reftores that “ unity of government which is the per“ fection of fuch a fociety: but in the “ general community, good is to be con“ tinually ballanced by evil, and in this “ equi poize lies the political order of the “ ftate.”

“ If fo, Sir, faid I to him, how is it “ that thofe ftates, where the moft abufes “ are reformed, are the beft governed.
 “ The Mufcovites, of all the European “ nations, were the leaft civilized, and “ confequently the moft unhappy, till “ Peter the Great appeared, who vigor-“ oufly fuppreffing abufes of all kinds, VOL. I. L “ from

“ from his reformation has sprung a “ powerful nation, a rich and happy “ people.

“ Brandenburg had neither force nor “ power; the art of war was scarce known “ there; it lay in obscurity; it was of no “ account among the states of Europe; “ and this contemptible condition was,
 “ in a great measure, owing to many “ abuses which its sovereigns either could “ not or would not reform. But in our “ times, one of its sovereigns has suppres“ sed abuses, introduced political order “ and military discipline; and this re“ formation has enabled him to act a ca“ pital part on the theatre of Europe.”

“ England is said once to have been no“ thing, till the parliament took in hand to “ form its power. It has since been continu“ ally retouching the political system, “ and correcting a number of abuses, “ which, for several centuries, hindered
 “ this

“ this ftate from emerging into power
 “ and reputation ; and now its bills fhew “ the continued fyftem of its great“ nefs.

“ France, Sir, is a home inftance of “ this. Lewis XIII. a weak Prince, and “ wholly governed by his minifters, con“ cerned not himfelf about abufes ; he “ left the ftate as he found it, full of mif-“ management and diforder. Your “ great grand-father changed the whole, “ and by the reformation he brought “ about in all the branches of govern“ ment, imparted, as it were, a new “ genius to his people.

“ France, during the firft years of “ Lewis XIV. rofe to a pitch of glory “ and grandeur beyond any thing ever “ feen in the Roman empire.”

Here the King fmiled, and very obligingly faid to me, “ I own, Madam, I did “ not think you had been so well ac“ quainted with these points ; it gives “ me infinite pleasure that, besides the “ graces of wit and vivacity, you are pos“ sessed of that knowledge which enlarges “ and revives the judgment. The world “ is often deceived in those matters, con“ tinued the King, and the greatness of “ Princes is almost ever confounded with “ the happiness of the people. A So“ vereign may make reformations in his “ kingdom, and his subjects be never the “ better for them ; he is the only gainer “ by the change.

“ Peter I. made considerable altera“ tions in Muscovy, but did not thereby “ make the Russians a whit the happier.
“ The revolution was felt only by the “ state. The Monarch became great “ and powerful, but the people still con“ tinued little and mean ; for to have “ brought them from the abject state in “ which

“ which they then were, required the “ suppression of a multitude of civil “ abuses and vices, which continued after “ his time, and still subsist. The pre“ sent Muscovites are fordid slaves, with “ all the ignorance and superstition of “ their fore-fathers, who lived before the “ reign of that great reformer Peter.
 “ And if the empire, once without a “ soldier, has now a numerous army; “ yet this adventitious power depends “ on the chance of a battle or two.

“ Prussia, with all the reformations “ made there, does not find itself more “ happy. The people, amidst their Mo“ narch’s victories, groan under the “ weight of the military burden laid on “ them ; and its power depends on the “ existence of one single man. When “ Frederick comes to die, its political “ state dies with him.

“ It is a question, continued the King, “ much debated, whether the English

“ are more powerful, and more happy, “ than they were before those volumes “ of reforming bills were in being: this “ is a point the nation itself is not agreed “ on. There is a party in England which “ affirms that the government is intirely “ ruined, and the political state indebted “ beyond what it is able to pay; and “ that it cannot answer its necessities.
“ Yet I am inclined to think that Eng“ land is increased in strength; but this is “ rather owing to the inadvertency of “ other powers; than to any reformati“ ons of its own, which would have profited “ very little, had its neighbours followed “ its example.

“ As to the instance of our own coun“ try, I have wished that France had “ been in the same situation, at my ac“ cession to the throne, that Lewis XIII.
“ left it in. His successor, what with re-“ formations, splendor, and glory, re“ duced

“duced it so low, that it will be ages before it is thoroughly recovered.”

Our political discussions were always mixed with politeness and compliments; never did a word come from Lewis XV's mouth which had any thing of asperity in it, &c.

England still kept a watchful eye on the French navy; and, on our side, the increase of it was the ministry's chief object. All M. Rouille's demands of money were immediately answered, and he lost no time: ships were daily launched.

France and England were, indeed, at peace; but acted with the same mistrust as if at open war; the public expences rose high; yet the French, who are continually complaining, did not in the least murmur, so convinced was every one of the absolute necessity of having a navy capable of facing that of Great Britain.

In the mean time, all the ministers continued declaring themselves against me; the very persons who, through my interest with his Majesty, had been promoted to the object of their wishes, were the most forward in promoting my disgrace. Since my living at Versailles, I have often lamented this flagitiousness, which is, as it were, innate in the human mind. No sooner is a man invested with honour and power, than he studies to cut off the hand which raised him. It is not my intention to enter into all the arts and practices of my enemies; there would be no end of the allusions, tales, stories, and songs, industriously disseminated over the kingdom to expose me. However, I was always exactly informed of what was said about me; but of some of my revilers I took no notice; others I threatened to complain of to the King. All, however, continued their their abufes : I was a thoufand times for leaving the court, had I not apprehended that the King being now habituated to fee me daily, it might fhorten his valuable life.

The Count de Argenfon, fecretary at war, did not love me, faying, “ That I gave too many military pofts ; that he had not fo much as a lieutenantcy of foot at his difpofal.” Now this accusation was fo far from being true, that I never recommended any perfon to his Majefty, without previously confulting that Minifter. It was purely my favour which rankled him ; he wanted to fet the King againft me, that he might ingrofs the whole royal favour to himfelf.

Peace being the feafon for public foundations, a plan of a military fchool, for inftructing the French nobility in the art of war, was laid before his Majefty in the year 1751.

The kingdom, said the author, was full of gentlemen who, unable, conveniently, to put themselves under masters, led an inactive life in the country, instead of spending it in the service of the state.

In this school five hundred gentlemen were to be boarded and educated: the King was pleased to shew me the plan, and asked my thoughts on it.

“Sir, said I, nothing can be better;
“I could only wish it more comprehen“sive. This school will not furnish of“ficers enough for France, which is so “frequently at war. I have heard Mar“shal Saxe say, That in an army of “two hundred and fifty thousand men, “there was seldom less than twenty “thousand officers; so that only one for“tieth of that number can be had from “the military-school, which to me ap“pears no small defect in a foundation, “of itself, so excellent.”

A cour-

A courtier, on reading the plan for this school, jocularly said, This martial convent will afford very good military monks.

The great objection made against it, by some discreet persons, was the exorbitant expence of it, at a time when every resource of the state had been drained to defray the extraordinary demands of the war. The expence, indeed, was not to be furnished from the royal treasury; but from whatever fund sums are taken on such occasions, they are still burthensome, as tending to keep the people poor.

It was likewise said, that France stood more in need of a naval than a military-school; that the King might find a hundred land-officers in his dominions, for one sea-officer; that the French gentry was naturally fond of signalizing itself in armies, and had as great an aversion to fleets; but the plan had been resolved on.

The powers of Europe were at peace, when religious disputes, breaking out, disturbed France in its political and domestic quiet.

Two parties, who, for forty years past, had been contending for the superiority, now returned to the charge. Being quite ignorant of the subject of their quarrels, I had it explained to me. Should ever these Memoirs be made public, the reader will be so kind as to excuse my tiring him with the following detail. Never had this evil found a place in these annals, had it not concerned the King; but his interesting himself in this dispute, and greatly so, is alone a sufficient motive for my giving some account of it.

A native of Spain, named Molina, in the fullness of his knowledge, took it into his head to decide, and vindicate, how God:

God acts on mortals, and in what manner mortals withftand God. The Popes, who know every thing, and pronounce fentence on every thing, had, till then, been totally unacquainted with the mechanism of the metaphyfical intercourse between the Creator and creature; and, for their better information, Molina invented many barbarous words, or fcholafitic terms, with innumerable diftinctions and divifions.

To proceed in this difpute with fome order, and wrangle theologically, he diftinguifhed between preventive and co-operating grace: one of thefe graces could do any thing, and the other little or nothing; but this not being fufficient for underftanding what he himfelf did not underftand, he farther invented the mediate knowledge and congruifm.

According to him, God held a council of ftate in Heaven, before which all men were fummoned and interrogated, how they

they will act after receiving his grace ; and, according to the free use which he saw they were to make of it, he decreed within himself, either to admit them into Paradise, or cast them down into hell.

Unluckily for the Christian world, this Molina was a Jesuit ; an order little beloved by the others : the Dominicans, especially, raised an outcry against his congruism.

These things being transacted in Spain, the Inquisition took cognizance of the altercation ; and had they burned Molina, and a few Dominicans, there would have been an end of the matter, and, for once, this tribunal had done a good piece of service to Christendom. Concomitant concurrence and co-operating grace had a trial at Rome ; but the more the parties disputed, the less understood they one another. A monk offered his mediation : but this mediator was less intelligible than the controversialists.

The

The difficulty was not fo much the putting an end to the difpute, as to know what the difpute was about. Neither party underftood themfelves or the other, and, in the mean time, with their free-will, mediate knowledge, complement of active virtue, &c. they ran themfelves more and more into darknefs.

The bickerings, at length, ceafed for want of difputants, there being times when monks facrifice every thing to indolence. All remained quiet, till one Cornelius Jansenius renewed the conteft; yet, inftead of inventing any thing, he only difputed behind a huge book, the author of which was named Baius. The Jefuits follicited the Pope to condemn Cornelius, and by the dexterity of their agents at Rome, carried their point there; but in other parts of Europe, it went againft them. The univerfities, the parliaments, and chiefly the women, profound judges of such things, sided with Jansenius.
found

A paper war commenced with great acrimony; congruism, by dint of bulky volumes, worsted predestination in some pitched battles: yet the war went on undecided; both parties being now grown powerful, and fighting merely for the honour of victory.

Till then, only private persons had appeared in the field; but now universities declaring themselves, the action became general. No accommodation was so much as talked of, there being no body, or society, in the state, of a power sufficient to compel the two parties to accept of its mediation.

In the mean time, the Molinist bishops drew up a condemnation of Jansenius's five articles, though, in the opinion of his party, they were no more than what St. Augustine himself had advanced. Several communities of men signed the condemnation; but the nuns, who have nothing to do, and eagerly catch at every opportunity which may bring them into the world again, protested against fubfcribing; and thofe of Port Royal diftinguifhed themfelves by their firmnefs, or obftinacy.

I do not wonder that they refufed fubfcribing, but am furprifed that their fubfcription fhould have been required; it was fhewing them a regard, on this affair, which ought not to have been fhewn them: on their pertinacious refufal, they were forcibly removed, and difperfed into other convents; whereas the real punifhment would have been to have kept them always in the fame fpot.

The Popes, likewise, from time to time, iffued new formularies, which gave an air of greater moment to the quarrel; but they had done much better to have left it to itfelf, and then Molina and Janfenius would foon have funk into oblivion;

vion; but the court of Rome is ever for being absolute.

In the midst of this war, however, a truce was brought about. Clement IX. a man of good sense and prudence, drew up a set of articles of capitulation, had them signed by the Jansenists, and thus brought about a peace; but, unhappily, when religion is in the case, war soon kindles again.

A father of the oratory, named Quesnel, is said, this time, to have been the instrument of discord. He wrote a book which, after being applauded throughout all Europe, France censured. It was not very easy to point out wherein this book was to be found fault with; but religious cabals were then in fashion. The Molinist party, in the mean time, carried it with a high hand, having the King's ear.

The confessor to Lewis XIV. was a Jesuit, who formed parties both at court and.

and in town, against the Jansenists; who keenly revenged themselves with their pens; thus, though there was a prevailing party, the war still continued.

Hitherto no manifestos had passed between the Molinists and the Jansenists, both parties, in the heat of their zeal, having taken up arms without any declaration of war. Lewis XIV. procured from Rome a bull, whereby a fire was kindled, which has not since been quenched. The Pope, the bishops; the King, the religious orders, in short, people of all ranks gradually engaged in the quarrel, to the great disturbance of the nation and families; all plotting and caballing one against the other.

The principal object of public hatred was father Le Tellier, who over-ruled the King's conscience: this was a hot and ambitious man, who wanted to revenge some personal offences given him by the Jansenists, and, in pursuit of his drift, alarmed

alarmed both the King's conscience and the kingdom.

Lewis XIV. towards the decline of his life, was grown weak and irresolute, and often harrassed with terrible fears of the devil. The hard-hearted Jesuit had possessed him with a persuasion, that the affair of the Molinists was the cause of God. His resentment chiefly aimed at the cardinal de Noailles, and he had the confidence to move his penitent to depose him judicially. The death of this Prince brought on a suspension of this bustle, which was called the constitution.

The Duke of Orleans, who loved neither popes nor bishops, and despised bulls, in order to rid himself both of the Molinists and Jansenists, appointed commissioners for hearing their broils, separately from the other affairs of the monarchy; with an intent to deprive them of their public importance: but the the wisdom of this precaution was frustrated; those people ftill were for figuring in the ftate. They appealed to a national council, which was nothing lefs than throwing off the yoke of the admiftration, to erect another independent of it. The regent banifhed and exiled both bifhops and priefts; but this remedy only inflamed the difeafe, hardening both parties in their obftinacy. The Jansenifts and Molinifts then formed themfelves into two factions, under the names of acceptants and recufants. The Acceptants called the Recufants heretics, and the Recufants gave the appellation of fchifmatics to the Acceptants.

The frenzy for efficacious grace was burfting out with greater violence than ever, when the Miffiffippi fcheme was fet on foot; then avarice did what neither the Pope nor King could: all the people's thoughts now ran only on getting getting money. The names of Jansenists and Molinists were almost forgotten, though to this nothing perhaps contributed more than the contempt and ridicule which the Duke of Orleans put on this controversy, calling it a trifle; whereas Lewis XIV. had been made to lay it to heart, as an affair of the greatest concern.

The subsequent wars under Lewis XV. made the Jansenists and Molinists to be still farther forgotten, though not without some occasional skirmishes on predestination; but as there was no general action, they were not much heeded.

The dispute, in the mean time, was not totally extinguished, or rather it was a fire lurking under embers. In 1750, the Molinists renewed hostilities, refusing the Sacraments to sick persons of the contrary party, under pretence of their not having confessional certificates.

The parliament intervened, and punished the delinquents; by which the two parties regained the confideration, which they had loft by the Duke of Orleans's meafures. This rupture gave rife to a new difcuffion, whether the parliament could intermeddle with this affair, or had any right to banifh, or inflict punifhments on priests, who, in refufing to adminifter the facraments, only conformed to the injunctions of their bifhops.

The Jansenifts faid that the civil magiftrate has a power legally fuperior even to that of the church, the order of a ftate depending on fuch fubordination; and they farther added, that the adminiftration of the Sacraments is the capital branch of the polity exercifed by the civil magiftrate.

The answer of the Molinifts was, that in fpirituals they acknowledged no other fuperiority than that of the Pope and his bifhops:

bishops; that civil affairs were the parliament's province, and all it ought to concern itself in; but that the kingdom of heaven had been committed to pastors, and not lawyers.

The subjects, in the mean time, died without the sacraments; the priests indeed were punished, yet the evil remained, and this affair gave the King much uneasiness: the Bourbons indeed have always laid to heart religious disturbances: the court gave itself more concern about these confessional certificates, than ever it had shewn in the most important political transactions. It often became necessary to put a violence on priests, and make use of soldiers to compel them to administer. Never, from the birth of Christ, had such a thing been seen, as having recourse to the bayonet for the administration of the most sacred mystery. It was indeed a horrid scandal; but to see subjects, jects, at the point of death, begging for the communion, and refused, was something still more shocking.

The King, one day, said to me, “ These people give me a great deal of uneasiness; if they go on, I shall be obliged to turn all the priests out of their livings, and have their functions performed by Capuchin-friars, who are intirely as I would have them, &c.” *

The court’s attention now came to be taken up with an affair of still greater importance than the constitution itself; the election of a King of the Romans. The house of Austria, fond of its greatness, is always providing for the future security of it. As Charles VI. had engaged the Sovereigns of Europe to make themselves the instruments of his ambition, even after his decease; Maria Theresa, in her life-time, took measures * 1751.

242      M E M O I R S of the
for fixing the Imperial throne in her family.

It was on a Prince who might be looked on as a Lorrainer, that she was conferring the title of presumptive heir; for Charles VI. dying without male-issuë, the house of Austria had ended in him. The circles of the empire accounted this measure a greater act of despotism than that of the late emperor; as hereby the empire, from an elective constitution, not only became hereditary, but even escheated to a foreign family: loud complaints were made, and that was all. It is now about a century, that the petty princes in Germany have not been able to shew their resentment against the house of Austria, any farther than by complaints and murmurs.

Maria Theresa, knowing how far her forces were superior to any which the Northern Princes could oppose to her designs, signs, communicated her plan to the other courts of Europe, and to France one of the first. The King shewed me the Austrian ambassador's reasons, digested into writing by M. de Puisieux, after a conference with that minister. The artful turn given to them by ambition, makes them worthy of being preserved.

“ The calamities still recent, said that “ Ambassador, which the vacancy of the “ Imperial throne, on the demise of “ Charles VI. brought on Europe, should “ move Christian Princes to prevent the “ like. The Emperor now reigning is “ in full health, and it may be presumed,
 “ that God will grant him length of days:
 “ but should one of those many acci“ dents to which human nature is liable, “ disappoint the public hopes, and “ shorten his valuable life, Christendom “ would be plunged in the same abysses, “ as on the decease of the last Emperor.

“ It is therefore the concern of all the “ European powers to prevent a war, “ that scourge which throws every thing “ into confusion, lays waste whole na“ tions, and thins mankind. The ca“ lamities caused by the late vacancy of “ the empire are not likely to be brought “ to a speedy end, and what will it be “ should new disturbances be accumu“ lated on the former ?

“ Too many precautions cannot be “ taken against evils, which, when once “ happened, cannot be averted, or the “ issue of them determined.

“ By the election of a King of the Ro“ mans, the views of Princes who may “ have formed designs, are prevented ; “ and the coronation once over, will “ suppress all cabals and intrigues about “ being head of the empire. When a “ sceptre is vacant, a great stir is made “ after it ; but when once possessed, it is “ no longer thought of.

“ Arch-

“ Archduke Joseph, indeed, should the “ Emperor die, is not of age to govern “ his dominions; but the evils of mino“ rity cannot be compared to those which “ the want of a head to the empire would “ occasion.

“ Not that the Queen of Hungary is “ in the least apprehensive of her heirs “ being deprived of a throne, the legal “ appenage of her family; her leading “ motive in this settlement is to prevent “ the needless effusion of blood.

“ On the death of Charles VI. it was “ seen that all Europe cannot make an “ Emperor. The Elector of Bavaria, “ after being placed on that throne by “ foreign armies, was always in a totter“ ing condition; so that had not death de“ prived him of the crown, he would “ have been obliged to resign it, &c.”

I have observed that ambassadors, in cases of personal interest, generally overlook the regard due to Princes by the law of nations. Here the Vienna minister would have France subvert the very foundations of the Imperial constitution, and make that crown hereditary, which had always been elective. He surely forgot that the house of Bourbon, as I have been told, had, at the treaty of Westphalia, made itself a guarantee of the liberties and privileges of the empire. His court seemed not to recollect that the election of a King of the Romans depended on the consent of the electors, in a diet held expressly for such election.

The King, on reading this Memoir, asked M. de Puisieux what he thought of the business. Sir, answered the Minister, you must consent to every thing; it is no longer worth France's while to meddle with the affairs of Germany; at present the King of Prussia is able to keep up the balance in the North, and hinder the house of Austria from lording it over yours; so that all we have to do now, is to look on. The council, however, was of a different opinion; but it is not the first time that one man has been wiser than an assembly.
have

The court of Vienna was likewise busy in bringing the other courts of Europe to countenance this election. That of England represented to the Marquis de Mirepoix, that it was the interest of France to close with the making a King of the Romans; doubtless, because it was theirs. This court afterwards went farther, and George the Second affirmed, that the election of a King of the Romans did not depend on the Electoral-college; that is, that the dignity of presumptive heir to the empire might be conferred without any deliberation of the electors, which was making the Imperial crown absolutely hereditary.

I remember all the memoirs of that time agree in the Archduke's being very young, but they all likewise added, that an Emperor under age was better than a vacancy of the throne, which amounts to an approbation of a regular succession.

A politician of our court, with whom I was talking of this election, told me, that there was an article in the treaty of Westphalia, which formally settled this affair. It is there expressly said, That no election of a King of the Romans shall be entered on, unless the reigning emperor be out of the empire, and with an intent to be absent a long time, or for ever; or that age should render him incapable of government; or there should manifestly appear some great necessity on which the safety of the empire depended. But treaties are never followed, and no more was said of this, than if it had never existed.

The King of Prussia alone stood up in defence of the Electoral-college; but he had his reasons for this specious conduct. The election of a King of the Romans secured

fecured the empire to the houfe of Auftria ; and it has been believed by many, that he himfelf looked that way. There is indeed no ambition, of which a Prince, fo powerful in war as to fubdue feveral nations, is not fufceptible.

I return to Verfailles, from whence the affair of the King of the Romans has carried me too far. Lewis XV. as I have faid elfewhere, was now a little relieved from the load of bufinefs impofed on him by the war ; peace allowed him a leifure, which was the very felicity of my life. Amidft the confufion of fieges and battles, he had no fettled refidence. Flanders had feveral times deprived me of him ; but the treaty of peace intirely reftored him to me, and his confidence in me daily increafed ; fo that he even imparted to me his uneafinefs, for kings have their troubles both as men and as Princes.

Lewis XV. would often lament, that he had no friends, and had a thousand times wished to have been a private person, for the sake of cordial friendship and sympathy, to the effects of which Kings are always strangers.

“ No sooner have I distinguished a “ subject by some considerable post, but “ a hundred others, jealous of the fa“ vour, grow out of humour with me;
 “ and, at the same time, I do not get the “ love of him on whom I have conferred “ the benefit; he complains that I have “ not done enough for him, and they,
 “ for my having done nothing for them.
 “ All love favour, and care little for the “ King. I see about me only sordid “ souls, slaves to pride and ostentation, “ acting only from interest; so that were “ it not for the many favours emanating “ from the throne, they would not move “ a finger. Another, and rather worse,

in.

“inconveniency annexed to the crown, is “the impossibility for kings to distin“guish honest men from those of a dif“ferent cast. They are so like each “other, as to be generally mistaken; for “at court vice and virtue appear in the “same colours. The bulk of those about “me, I strongly suspect to be void of “any one generous principle; but when “I am for sifting them, my rank will not “allow of the proper measures. Thus “they remain impenetrable to me, yet I “must employ them in the service of “the state; and hence arise those public “misfortunes, for which I am answerable “both to the present time and to pos“terity.

“When some important choice is to “be made, and I have pitched on the “person, all France seems to lay their “heads together to deceive me. His “talents, his merit and virtue, are cried:

“ up to me ; not one honest man do I “ meet with in the kingdom to mention “ a word of any fault of his ; they are “ afraid of incurring the displeasure of “ him whom I have so recently distin“ guished by my favour ; and to this “ mean spirited fear they sacrifice both “ me and the state.

“ When, on the other hand, I with“ draw my confidence from a minister, “ or some other place-man, then I am “ told that he is deficient in every poli“ tical quality : those very persons who “ could never say enough in his praise, “ now draw him in the most contemptible “ colours ; all his faults and errors, and “ sinister practices, are laid open to me “ in full detail. The terrible accounts “ given of him from all hands set me “ against him, so that I cannot bring my“ self to employ him, even though, by “ the reflections on his past conduct and “ dis-

“ disgrace, he should afterwards become “ thoroughly qualified for a public sta“ tion.

“ A patriot King is the most unhappy “ mortal under the sun; he has his coun“ try’s happiness at heart, and is beset “ by people who cross his good inten“ tions. The ministers are the first in “ ruining a state, to save themselves the “ labour of reforming abuses: to leave “ things as they are, is soonest done; in “ the mean time, the evils continue, and “ when a Monarch, tender of the welfare “ of his subjects, would remedy them, “ he meets unfurmountable impediments;
 “ for the habit of a long and bad admi-“ stration at length comes to supersede “ the laws and usages, &c. &c.”

Another time Lewis XV. was pleased to open himself to me on the same subject: “ A great misfortune to a King “ is, that ministers generally conceal the “ true

“ true state of things from them. So“ vereigns are always made acquainted “ with the calamities of their dominions
“ the last ; and this, lest such informa“ tion should put them on taking the “ reins of government into their own “ hands ; and every one makes it his “ study to keep them in the dark. The “ immense variety of concerns in a large “ monarchy, obliges him to trust to mi“ nisters, and these ministers, for the “ greater part, play false with him. On “ the last war, I consulted those who “ were at the head of the administration, “ whether the advantages of victories “ would balance the inevitable misfor“ tunes of battles : one and all assured “ me, that by no other way could the “ kingdom be retrieved, than by the “ glory of my arms ; and that the lustre “ and advantages derived from the vic“ tories, would be the more lasting and “ solid.

“ folid, as due only to the nation’s own “ ftrength.

“ At the peace, I found they had de“ ceived me ; my fubjects are in the “ utmoft diftreff, and all owing to the “ war ; fo that to recover themfelves muft “ be the work of years ; and fhould frefh “ difturbances happen, it will never be “ done, &c. &c.”

I likewise had my complaints. “ Sir, “ faid I to the King, my grievances, tho’ “ of a different nature from yours, are “ not lefs painful. The rancour of all “ France is pointed at me. The royal “ family inveighs againft me ; his royal “ Highnefs the Dauphin takes all op“ portunities of affronting me : your “ minifters look on me as the fatal rock “ on which all their defigns go to wreck.
 “ The chief families of the kingdom “ treat me with contempt ; and all this “ becaufe your Majefty has thought “ me worthy of your efteem.

“ Many carry their malevolence so far, “ as to impute the disorders of the “ finances to me, as if the administration “ of affairs was lodged in my hands. I “ am accused of having all the money in “ the kingdom; I am charged with the “ nation’s debts, as if I myself had con“ tracted them. On any minister’s fail“ ing in his duty, the blame is immediate“ ly laid on me. I am exclaimed against “ for his being preferred, and his dis“ grace is imputed as a crime to me.

“ It is I who bear the blame of all po“ litical misfortunes; and if I have not “ been directly accused of having de“ clared war against your enemies, it has “ been said, that I might have prevented “ those murderous sieges and battles, as “ if the fate of Europe was at my beck,
“ and I could model foreign courts.

“ I have been reproached with the “ oversights of your generals; not a “ battle.

“ battle has been lost, not a siege has “ been raised, but it is all owing to me.
“ So much as their personal variances “ and quarrels are laid at my door.

“ The public distresses, though the “ consequence of a bad administration, “ and the misfortunes of the times, have “ been attributed to me, as if my doing.
“ The populace has hissed me, and was “ often for stopping my coach, and has “ been near coming to those extremities “ against me, with which they only are “ treated whose notorious malversation “ has manifestly ruined a people.

“ Yet, Sire, what gives me most pain, “ is the ingratitude of those who have “ felt the effects of my favour. I have “ often solicited your Majesty for per“ sons, who were no sooner out of the “ meanness and obscurity from whence I “ drew them, than they forgot the kind “ hand by which they had been raised. I can “ reckon,

“ reckon, hitherto, about three thousand “ persons who owe their subsistence to “ me. It is through my care that they “ have been brought into new stations, “ where they lost sight of me before they “ were well warm in their places.

“ Of such a great number, not one “ have I found with any due sense of “ gratitude : nay, the greater the prefer“ ment, the less their acknowledgment ; “ some have even busily caballed against “ me : those whom I thought most my “ friends, and whom the important ser“ vices I had done them should have “ made such, have been the first in de“ ceiving and injuring me. I have dis“ covered treacheries at which I shudder“ ed ; so that since my living at court, I “ am grown sick of mankind. I should “ have died a thousand times under the “ anguish which such injurious treat“ ment has caused me, had not the “ kind-

“ kindness with which your Majesty “ honours me reconciled me to life,
 “ &c.”

* The death of the Prince of Wales, eldest son to George II. and as such, presumptive heir to the crown of England, made some impression at Versailles: this Prince is said not to have been remarkable for those eminent qualities with whose brilliancy the world is so much taken: but they who knew him personally, perceived in him the more solid virtues: compassion, goodness, sensibility, tenderness, candour, affability, a readiness to oblige, and delight in doing good; these were his leading dispositions: a Prince, in a word, qualified to make a people happy. He had married a German Princess, intirely deserving to ascend the throne with him. I have often pitied this Lady's fate, to lose an affectionate husband and a powerful crown at once, is one of those events which elevated souls alone can bear with firmness. His death occasioned a revolution in political affairs. France had great hopes of things going better, when that Prince should have come to the throne: there was no cordial harmony between him and his father King George. The son often crossed the father's measures, so that they seldom saw, and seldomer spoke to each other. From this disposition it was hoped, that a Prince, who so much disapproved the present system, would be less inveterate against the house of Bourbon than his predecessors had been. It was imagined that his accession would prove a happy turn for France, when, perhaps, it might have only made matters worse. The sons of Kings, at their entrance on regality, leave their ideas as Princes at the foot of the throne, and take up those of Kings.

* 1751.

tionate

George

George II. is faid not to have fhewn any great concern at the death of his fon, appearing as ufual in the drawing-room, and, within a few days, giving audience to Ambaffadors: in this there might be a little affectation, it being the known character of that Prince to fhew himfelf firm and unshaken, in the midft of the moft unfortunate events. The reft of the royal family were in the deepeft affliction: he was alfo greatly lamented by his houfhould; and I am told, that his death is ftill matter of concern to many.

The death of this Prince likewise caufed a national uneafinefs, his children being very young, and King George advanced in years, which might be productive of the diforders almoft inevitable under a minority. In order to prevent them, the Princefs Dowager of Wales was nominated guardian to the King's fucceffor, and regent of the kingdom, till

till her son should be of age; but the issue of the deliberation was, that this Lady, who had come into England to wear the crown, should be neither Queen nor Regent.

The French clergy's affair, though thought to be over, was still going on. The bishops and wealthy incumbents, amidst the privacy of their dwellings, to which they had been ordered, disturbed the state; though ardently desirous of returning to Paris, they were for coming at this privilege as cheap as they could, haggling a long time with the King, who, however, would make no abatement. They insisted on their immunities, they pleaded their solemn promise to the Pope to maintain their rights. This dispute irritated the court, and not a little soured the King. At this juncture, a bishop took it into his head to come and expostulate with me about the clergy's pre-prerogatives. This certainly was not taking the right time, for as this affair gave fo much difpleafure to his Majefty, it could not be very pleafing to me. The Prelate made a long-winded harangue, in proof that the church was not to diffeize itfelf of its wealth. He recurred as far back as St. Peter, and through an enumeration of thofe bulls, by which the church is ordered to keep what it has, came down to our times. “My Lord, “ faid I interrupting him, your prerogatives are what I know nothing of, but “ I know that your chief duty, like that “ of other fubjects, is to obey the King. “ Say what you will of your bulls and immunities ; every body of men declining “ to conform to its Sovereign’s orders, is “ guilty of rebellion, and deferves the “ punifhment of high treafon.”

A great many bad books came out againft the clergy, in vindication of the King’s

King's cause. Among the several writers who, on these occasions, take different parts, one wrote a pamphlet with the title of An Impartial Inquiry into the Immunities of the Clergy. This work was full of very judicious reflections, besides a nervous elegance of stile: it was indeed the only one on the subject which deserves reading.

After all, it became necessary that the plan which had been proposed, and to which I myself had advised the King, should take place. This was to draw up a state of the value of every churchman's preferments, that each might be taxed in proportion to his real income; and accordingly the court ordered the intendants of the provinces to oblige all the beneficed clergy to deliver in an account of the nature of their several revenues. There was indeed a very hard clause, in case of a refusal; the intendants being ex-

exprefsly enjoined to feize on the feveral revenues in the King's name, and leave the beneficiaries only an alimentary penfion. This was infuring their compliance; for being ufed to superfluity, they could but very indifferently fhift with no more than was neceffary.

The clergy of France had already begun to lower their voice, when the parliament of Paris raifed theirs. I could find in my heart to fay, that in France the ftate is ever out of order; no fooner has the Sovereign repaired fome weak part of his prerogative, than another appears to be running to ruin.

The parliament, inftead of conforming to his pleafure, according to their ufual way, fent a deputation with remonftrances. Thefe fpeeches fet out with great proteftations of refpect and fubmiffion, but are feldom without fome term which favours of a republican spirit, tending to independency; and not seldom they strike at the prerogative of the crown.

The King, though naturally irresolute, had his intervals of firmness, in which he was immoveable. He gave the deputies to understand, that he would have his edicts enrolled that very day, under penalty of disobedience and immediate punishment.

The parliament were sitting when the deputies returned to Paris; being forbid to deliberate, they registered the edicts. After this act of duty, which they stiled deference, a second deputation was dispatched to Versailles. These gentlemen began their harangue in this manner: Your Majesty has commanded, and your parliament has obeyed.

A courtier said, that there they ought to have stopped, all the remainder mainder of their long ſpeech being quite ufelefs and ſuperfluous.

The King was pleaſed, in the evening, to mention this affair to me; and his having got the better of the parliament, made him much gayer than uſual; but this extraordinary chearfulneſs raiſed in me ſome miſgivings. To me, a body whoſe temporary ſubmiſſion excited in its maſter ſuch a lively joy, appeared dangerous.

F I N I S.

Cleaned & Oiled

Aug 15 1978

10/

